EDWARD DOWDEN.

My Dear Professor Dowden :

I wish to inscribe this book to you, because, though it does not claim the distinction of literary value which belongs to your work, it may prove useful to readers of modern poetry ; and if it so proved, I should be glad to think that the name of one to whom I owe so much—and that not merely as a student—might be read here as that of my teacher and friend.

Very sincerely yours,

W. MACNEILE DIXON.

PORTRAITS OF TENNYSON.

THE earliest portrait of Tennyson was painted by Samuel Laurence in 1838. Five were painted by G. F. Watts (who also painted a portrait of Mrs Tennyson), a profile in 1856, a three-quarters in 1858, another in 1859, a full face in 1865 (in the National Portrait Gallery), a three-quarters in 1891 (in Trinity College, Cambridge). To these may be added a portrait by Herkomer in 1878. Woolner, the sculptor, executed a portrait medallion in 1850, a profile bust in 1856 (in Trinity College, Cambridge, replica in Westminster Abbey), a three-quarters in 1867, and another bust in 1873. Of photographs of Tennyson among the best and best known are those taken by Mrs J. M. Cameron.

A TENNYSON PRIMER.

CHAPTER I.

ALFRED TENNYSON, the acknowledged representative of his age in poetry, was born on August 6, 1809, at Somersby Rectory, in the village of Somersby, in Lincolnshire. His parents were of gentle blood: his father, the Rev. George Clayton Tennyson, rector of Somersby and vicar of Great Grimsby, a man of exceptional culture, Parentage versatile powers, imaginative temper, and and strongly marked character; his mother, a Childhood. daughter of the Rev. Stephen Fytche, vicar of Louth. Frederick and Charles* (afterwards Charles Tennyson-Turner), who preceded Alfred in a family of twelve, both became distinguished as poets in after life. From his earliest years Alfred was devoted to poetry, and seemed destined for a poetical career. His first recorded verse was the cry that broke from him, when a child of five, as the wind hurried him down the garden walk:

“I hear a voice that’s speaking in the wind.”

While still very young, some verses written upon his slate—the subject, the flowers in the rectory garden—modelled upon Thomson, the only poet he had then read, were rewarded by a “Yes, you can write,” from his brother; a little later the death of his grandmother was the theme of a poem which drew from his grandfather half a sovereign, and the prophecy, soon to be falsified, "That is the first money, my boy, that you've made by poetry, and, take my word for it, it will be the last."

Perhaps the lines in the Poems by Two Brothers, beginning, "There on the bier she sleeps," are an improved version of this early attempt.* In his twelfth year he was busy on an epic in imitation of Scott, which ran to some thousand lines, and in his fifteenth he essayed a drama. Of these poems it is interesting to note that, in his father's judgment, they gave promise of a famous future. "If Alfred die," said Mr. Tennyson, "one of our greatest poets will have gone."

For three years Alfred attended the grammar school at Louth,† which was followed by home tuition. The changes hardly broke the tranquil, dreamy life spent by the boy, chiefly alone—for he was naturally of retiring disposition—or in long rambles with his favourite brother Charles. The news of Byron's death, in 1824, was the first wave of emotion from the outside world that touched him. "I thought," he said, "that everything was over and finished for every one—that nothing else mattered. I remember I walked out alone and carved 'Byron is dead!' into the sandstone." Two years later Alfred and Charles joined in a poetical venture, and put forth a small volume; but rather, it appears, in search of pocket-money than fame. A Louth bookseller, Jackson by name, was induced to give twenty pounds for the copyright of their juvenilia. The Poems by Two Brothers (1826), containing one hundred and two short poems, was published, and the money spent on a tour round the churches of Lincolnshire.

The scenery of Lincolnshire* is faithfully sketched as background to all the early poetry of Tennyson which is not purely derivative ; the rich meadow and gradual slope, the " ridged wolds," the picturesque wandering lanes, as well as the " glooming flats" and less attractive features of the fen country, appear in it, even the

" . . . woods that belt the gray hillside,
The seven elms, the poplars four
That stand beside my father's door."

—Ode to Memory.

In 1828 Charles and Alfred went up to Trinity College, Cambridge, whither Frederick had preceded them. Alfred's rooms were in Corpus Buildings, overlooking the main quadrangle of King's College, and within hearing of its chapel organ. The change from the quiet, rural life of his childhood to that of the university, where many of the lasting friendships of his life were made, was fraught with important influences upon Tennyson's career. He became the central figure of a group of brilliant young men, not a few of whom bore names afterwards distinguished : Richard Monckton Milnes (afterwards Lord Houghton), James Spedding (the " J. S." of the poem, " You ask me why, tho' ill at ease"), J. M. Kemble (the " J. M. K." of the sonnet, " My heart and hope is with thee"), Richard Chenevix Trench (afterwards Archbishop of Dublin), W. H. Brookfield (to whom the sonnet, " Brooks, for they called you so that knew you best," was addressed), Henry Alford (afterwards Dean of Canterbury), Edmund Lushington, Charles Merivale (afterwards Dean of Ely), and Arthur Hallam, the eldest son of Henry Hallam, the historian.* Between Arthur Hallam and Alfred Tennyson grew up a friendship so close and deep as rightly to be named ideal—a friendship which, though cut short by Hallam's death in less than five years (In Memoriam, xxii.), must be reckoned one of the great determining forces of the poet's life. Hallam, Tennyson's junior by two years, was at this time the more widely read and accomplished scholar, and gave equal promise of future name and fame. His engagement, in the year in which he left Cambridge, to Emily Tennyson, Alfred's sister, promised to add another bond to that of friendship (In Memoriam, lxxxiv.), a promise sadly unfulfilled.†

Before going up to the University, Tennyson had been at work upon a poem entitled The Lover's Tale. After a few years' interval the first and second parts appeared in print in 1833 (the same year as Browning's Pauline), "when," wrote the author (in the preface to the edition of 1879), "feeling the imperfection of the poem, I withdrew it from the press." Copies were, however, in circulation, and the work was reprinted without his consent and without the improvements which were in contemplation. In self-defence a corrected and improved version, with the addition of a third part, The Golden Supper, a work of the author's mature life, was published in 1879. The Lover's Tale contains one line—of which Tennyson had already made use in his now famous university prize poem, a fact which may be noted as an example of his almost parsimonious habit of treasuring a good line like a jewel until he could find for it a suitable setting. Three lines, also from the same poem, appear again in the Ode to Memory.*

"A center'd glory-circled memory"—

In 1829, Milnes, Hallam, and Alfred Tennyson were all competitors for the Vice-Chancellor's medal in English verse—the subject “Timbuctoo.” Tennyson was a candidate at his father's request, and the verses sent in were remodelled to some extent from an unfinished earlier poem on the Battle of Armageddon. To him the medal was awarded, despite the fact that it was supposed to be de rigueur that the compositions should be in the heroic couplet, and Tennyson had chosen for his metre blank verse. Promise of great poetry to come was found in Timbuctoo by several acute readers, and it is creditable to the discernment of the examiners that they were able to appreciate its merit. Both here and in The Lover's Tale the influence of Shelley is clearly evidenced, but the ring and movement of the blank verse which we now recognise as Tennysonian unmistakably display themselves.

During the autumn of 1830 Hallam and Tennyson visited Spain—a visit commemorated in The Valley of Caunteretz—to carry money and letters of encouragement to the revolutionists, with some of whose leaders they had interviews.† The enthusiasm of the youthful poets had been kindled by the struggle for freedom in the Spanish war of independence, much as the spirits of Wordsworth and Coleridge had been aroused by the hopes of the French Revolution. But, like Wordsworth, Tennyson came to a different and perhaps wiser mind when his knowledge of revolutionary men and methods was nearer and more personal. In this year of the visit to the Pyrenees was published Alfred's first independent volume of verse, Poems, Chiefly Lyri-cal. The original design had been to include poems by Hallam in the volume, but owing to the disapproval expressed by Hallam's father the idea of a poetic partnership was given up, and the book appeared as we have it. In this year also appeared a volume of poems, Sonnets and Fugitive Pieces, by Charles Tennyson, the brother with whom Alfred had joined in the production of the Poems by Two Brothers. Wordsworth, writing from Cambridge about this time, remarked : " We have also a respectable show of blossom in poetry—two brothers of the name of Tennyson ; one in particular not a little promising."

The death of his father in March, 1831, brought Tennyson's University career to a close without a degree, nor does it seem that he had any regard for the traditions of Cambridge or breathed its atmosphere with any keen enjoyment.* He had taken little part as conspirator in a small way, and made friends with two or three gallant men, who have since been trying their luck with Valdes."

* The following sonnet, written in pencil, appears on the fly-leaf of the 1833 volume in the Dyce collection of the South Kensington Museum :

" Therefore your halls, your ancient colleges,
Your portals statued with old kings and queens,
Your gardens, myriad-volumed libraries,
Wax-lighted chapels, and rich carven screens,

in the life a university offers, and was never a candidate for academic distinctions. To a chosen few, a coterie known as "the Apostles" (In Memoriam, lxxxvii.), he was accustomed to read his verses as they were composed, but it was understood that no criticism would be acceptable. From the first the natural sensitiveness of the poet, which increased in later life to an almost morbid degree, made him extremely averse to a word of dispraise. The same sensitiveness debarred him from playing any active part in the world of men, and at no period was his circle of acquaintanceship large. But while impatient of adverse criticism, there was never author who turned it to better account when it came ; and the day of its coming was not long delayed. The first rude breath of censure blew from the critical journals, Blackwood and the Quarterly, soon after the appearance of Poems, Chiefly Lyrical, and the Poems of 1832. These reviews dealt in the trenchant style of the time with the affectations and weaknesses apparent to every cultivated reader in the work of the new poet. He was described as "the pet of a cockney

Your doctors, and your proctors, and your deans,
Shall not avail you, when the day-beam sports
New risen o'er awakened Albion—no !
Nor yet your solemn organ-pipes that blow
Melodious thunders thro' your vacant courts
At morn and eve—because your manner sorts
Not with this age wherefrom you stand apart,
Because the lips of little children preach
Against you, you that do profess to teach,
And teach us nothing, feeding not the heart."

The following note is appended : " I have a great affection for my old university, and can only regret that this spirit of undergraduate irritability against the Cambridge of that day ever found its way into print." This sonnet is reprinted in the life of the poet by his son.

coterie," a remark at the time not very wide of the truth. Though unsympathetic, therefore, his early critics were no less valuable friends to Tennyson than his band of faithful admirers. His education as an artist was far from complete, his instrument not yet in tune, and it is with the manner rather than the matter of the reviews that any reasonable quarrel can be raised. While Tennyson replied to the Blackwood article bitterly enough in the verses, afterwards suppressed, describing Wilson as "rusty, fusty Christopher," he was careful to adopt his suggestions almost without exception; and though the Quarterly review was resented, it was honoured scrupulously in the same way. This was to exhibit the temper of the child, but to act like a man. The voices, moreover, were very far from being all against Tennyson. Coleridge praised the poems, while he expressed the opinion that the new poet was not yet master of the metrical craft, and confessed to his own difficulty in scanning some of the verses. The Westminster Review of January, 1831, had been full of eulogy; Hallam himself, in the Englishman's Magazine of August, had warmly praised the genius of his friend in a glowing article, and Leigh Hunt, in the Tatler of the same year (February and March), in reviewing Alfred's poems, together with the volume of sonnets by Charles, while he praised both, had predicted the laurel of the future for Alfred.

In the year that Arthur Hallam took his degree (1832) he was a guest at Somersby. "Fifty years hence people will make pilgrimages to this place," he said. About this time his engagement to Emily Tennyson was made public, and he went up to London to begin his career at the bar, the profession he had chosen as the best avenue to the public life to which he looked. Until compelled, the following year, to seek health abroad, Hallam was domiciled at 67 Wimpole Street — “the dark house in the long, unlovely street.” “You will always find me at sixes and sevens,” he was accustomed to say as a mnemonic for his friends. In September of 1833 the end came.

—“In Vienna’s fatal walls God’s finger toucht him, and he slept.”

He was buried at Clevedon, not far from where the Severn meets the sea and “in the hearing of the wave.”

After Arthur Hallam’s death Tennyson went to reside in London. So poignant a sorrow as the early loss of his best-loved friend hung like a heavy cloud over his life. It was the poet’s “dark hour,” how dark we learn from The Two Voices.^{*} No volume was published between the Poems of In London, 1832 and the revised and enlarged edition, in two volumes, of 1842. Occasional verses had appeared in 1831 in the Gem, and in the following year in the English Magazine, the Yorkshire Literary Annual, and Friendship’s Offering; and others followed.

During these silent years in London Tennyson became one of Carlyle’s most frequent visitors—none more congenial—“a true human soul or some authentic approximation thereto, to whom your own soul can say, Brother!” The poet of these London days was described in Carlyle’s picturesque style thus: “A great shock of rough, dusty-dark hair; bright, laughing, hazel eyes; massive aquiline face, most massive, yet most delicate; of sallow brown complexion, almost Indian-looking; clothes cynically loose, free and easy ; smokes infinite tobacco. His voice is musically metallic—fit for loud laughter and piercing wail, and all that may lie between ; speech and speculation free and plenteous ; I do not meet in these late decades such company over a pipe." In 1838 he appeared as a member of the Anonymous Club, of which Carlyle, Mill, Thackeray, Landor, Macready, Sterling, Cunningham, and other men of letters were members. Some of his poems were handed about in manuscript and read by friends. Some were even in print, for Tennyson had prepared for his private use in 1842 a volume entitled Morte d'Arthur, Dora and other Idylls, containing eight blank verse poems. The details of this period of Tennyson's life are but scanty, and there is little for a biographer to relate. We know that he became strongly attached to Rogers, the veteran poet, and at his house met, among men of note, Gladstone, Leigh Hunt, and Tom Moore. The following note occurs in the diary of Henry Crabb Robinson :

"31 Jan., 1845. I dined this day with Rogers. We had an interesting party of eight—Moxon, the publisher ; Kenny, the dramatic poet ; Spedding, Lushington, and Alfred Tennyson, three young men of eminent talent, belonging to literary young England—the latter, Tennyson, being by far the most eminent of the young poets. He is an admirer of Goethe, and I had a long tête-à-tête with him about the great poet."

It is certain that Carlyle's influence was a potent factor in the enlargement and development of his intellectual sympathies ; and to it, as well as to Hallam's death, is due the graver, more philosophical note soon to be heard in Tennyson's poetry. While he still continued to pay studious attention to the external form of his verse, he essayed higher subjects and grappled with the deeper problems. In these days he met and talked far into the night, smoking "infinite tobacco," with his chosen friends, or read far and wide, and brooded over the poems that were to set the seal upon his reputation in the 1842 volumes ; in Carlyle's words, "carrying a bit of chaos about him which he was manufacturing into kosmos." With the publication of the volumes just mentioned Tennyson's place in English literature was beyond question assured. The author of Locksley Hall, Ulysses, the Vision of Sin, and the Morte d'Arthur was universally acknowledged the first poet of the day. "He is decidedly," wrote, in 1845, Wordsworth, whom he had met for the first time two years earlier, "the first of our living poets." That year saw the fourth edition of the two volumes, and Moxon, his publisher, confessed that Tennyson was the only poet by the publication of whose work he was not a loser.

In 1837 the Tennyson family had left Somersby for Beech Hill House, near Hill Beech, situated on the border of Epping Forest, and near Waltham Abbey, whose bells are addressed in the fine greeting to the New Year, now familiar to all English ears :

"Ring out, wild bells, to the wild sky !"

In 1840 came another change to Tunbridge Wells, and in the next year still another to Boxley, near Maidstone. Here Alfred's youngest sister, Cecilia, was married to Edmund Law Lushington, professor of Greek in the University of Glasgow, the wedding which is the subject of the closing section of In Memoriam. In 1845,* through the influence of Milnes, Tennyson's name was placed by Sir Robert Peel, who had never previously heard of the poet, upon the Civil List for a pension of two hundred pounds a year, and his pecuniary anxieties, for some time pressing, were at an end. Though approved of by the majority, by some the pension was considered premature, and Bulwer Lytton, in his satire, The New Timon, made a sharp attack upon Tennyson, both as poet and pensioner. He was there spoken of as "School-Miss Alfred," and his poetry described as

. . . "a jingling medley of purloined conceits
Out-babying Wordsworth, and out-glittering Keats."

A note to the passage stated that Tennyson had been "quartered on the public purse in the prime of life, without either wife or family." The reply was not delayed, and a set of verses in Punch, signed "Alcibiades," proved that stinging satire was quite within Tennyson's reach also, had he cared to enter that field.* An Afterthought, now included in his works form in Tennyson's poems, wrote enthusiastically: "I am not sure that Tennyson is not the greatest of poets."

* "We know him out of Shakespeare's art,
And those fine curses which he spoke—
The old Timon with his noble heart, under the title of Literary Squabbles, appeared the following week over the same signature, and more justly represents Tennyson's true attitude towards such controversies. The passage of detraction in the New Timon was subsequently excised ; and the amende honorable was acknowledged by the dedication, in 1876, of the drama of Harold to the novelist's son. Among other attacks may be noted the Bon Gaultier Ballads (the work of Theodore Martin and W. E. Aytoun), 1845, which contained some clever parodies of the 1842 poems.* About this time Howitt wrote of Tennyson : " It is very possible you may come across

" But men of long-enduring hopes,
And careless what the hour may bring,
Can pardon little would-be Popes,
And Brummels when they try to sting.

" An artist, sir, should rest in art,
And waive a little of his claim ;
To have the great poetic heart
Is more than all poetic fame.

* * * * *

" A Timon you ! Nay, nay, for shame,
It looks too arrogant a jest—
That fierce old man—to take his name,
You bandbox ! off, and let him rest."

* The following stanza from The Laureate, parodying The Merman, will serve as an example :

" Who would not be
The Laureate bold,
With his butt of sherry
To keep him merry,
And nothing to do but to pocket his gold.
'Tis I would be the Laureate bold."

This was written on the death of Southey (1843), and was intended as an ironical demand for the appointment of Tennyson.

him in a country inn, with a foot on each hob of the fireplace, a volume of Greek in one hand, his meerschäum in the other, so far advanced towards the seventh heaven that he would not thank you to call him back into this nether world."

Although Tennyson's reputation was now firmly established, there wanted not on the part of the best critics a certain reticence as to the quality of his attainment. In 1846, Wordsworth, in conversation with Thomas Cooper, spoke some weighty words which probably represented the more reserved and less enthusiastic verdict of the time, the opinion of those who felt that so far the new poet had given signs indeed of very unusual power, but had trifled with his art rather than given himself seriously to its greater aims. "There is little," said Wordsworth, "that can be called high poetry. Mr. Tennyson affords, indeed, the richest promise. He will do great things yet, and ought to have done greater things by this time." Ere-long he was to show the best he had to give. In 1848 a new issue of The Princess (published the previous year) "produced among the fogs and smuts of Lincoln's Inn," appeared, a poem, the plan of which had been talked over as early as 1839, and was thought by the author to contain some of his best blank verse.* But the central year of the century was Tennyson's Annus Mirabilis, the year which saw the publication of his greatest poem, his marriage, and his appointment as Poet Laureate.

In 1850 Tennyson left Cheltenham, where he had chiefly resided from 1844. The years that lay between these two dates were mainly occupied in the composition of the great elegy which enshrines the memory of Arthur Hallam. In Memoriam appeared in 1850, at first anonymously. On June 13 of the same year, the author was married at Shiplake Church, Oxfordshire, to Emily Sellwood, a niece of Sir John Franklin, the Arctic explorer.* Wordsworth had died earlier in the year, and in November Alfred Tennyson was appointed his successor as Poet Laureate,† and the seal of national recognition placed upon his already great fame. For two years after his marriage, on his return from a wedding journey in Italy,‡ the poet lived at Twickenham, famous on account of Pope's residence there, and now (as Mr. G. J. Cayley, in a blank verse letter, wrote to the Laureate) "twice classic."

From this year until that of his death Tennyson's career was a summer of unbroken splendour, clouded only by the death of his brother Charles, in 1879, and his son Lionel, in 1885. Unlike most poets, he lived a long life through in the sunshine of critical as well as popular favour, honoured by all and revered by many as among the very greatest of English poets. No such supreme lot has perhaps ever fallen to a poet of any race or country in the history of the world.

His verses To the Queen, written after his appointment to the Laureateship, have been so altered and amended that scarcely a line of the original remains as at first. The original ms. contained these two verses, afterwards omitted :

Tennyson's almost immediate and unanimous acceptance as a poet—a circumstance in itself usually far from prophetic of enduring fame—may be set down as due in part to the versatility of his poetic manner, and in part to the absence of serious rivals. He was fortunate in the possession of many brilliant gifts; he was perhaps even more fortunate in his birth time, and in the length of days granted him, with faculties unimpaired, and with ample space wherein to establish his monument and enjoy his fame. Of the great poets of the century, but few reached even middle life; for Keats and Shelley and Byron the light was early quenched; Wordsworth and Southey and Coleridge had overlived their poetic prime, and the fruit of public acceptance was once more ripe for plucking. And Tennyson, in whose brain the man of the world was not unrepresented, took the nearest way to fame in that he made appeal, in almost every volume of verse published in his earlier years, to the people as well as to the critics. He was the man of the hour, and, with no very bold or illuminating opinions to offer, gave expressions in his poetry to the prevailing feelings, the prevailing thought of the time. The admiration of the few and the critical was excited by the perfection of his art, the admiration of the many and unsophisticated readers of poetry by the simple and graceful treatment of themes generally themselves simple, frequently English. The few were delighted to find their own thoughts in the delicate and exquisite version of a scholar of perfect taste ; the many could not deny that here were poems which never ran on to undue lengths, easily understood, even more easily enjoyed, and praised by all poetical authorities.

The first year of Tennyson's married life was partly spent in Italy, the route chosen being through the Riviera to Florence. Save for a few stanzas in The Keepsake, a farewell sonnet to Macready, read by John Forster at the banquet Married Life, given the actor on the eve of his depart- Travels, and ure, and the dedication "to the Queen"* Political Poems. of the seventh edition of the Poems, there was nothing of importance published during the year. But in 1852 the political horizon became clouded and threatening, and Tennyson, in company with most of his countrymen, viewed with extreme distrust the events taking place in France. The period of excitement that followed the coup d'état of December, the abolition of the constitution of the French Republic by Louis Napoleon, gave birth to three patriotic lyrics, published under the pseudonym of "Merlin" in the Examiner. It was not until 1872 that Tennyson acknowledged the authorship of these lyrics by the publication in the library edition of his works of the stirring lines entitled The Third of February, which, with the poems, Britons, Guard your Own and Hands all Round, had given full expression to the national feeling in England towards the French emperor and those weak-kneed English peers who,

to purchase peace at any price, would have "salved the tyrant o'er."

In September 1852 the Duke of Wellington died, and upon the day of his funeral appeared in the Times the first version of Tennyson's funeral ode, a poem which, if studied in its various editions, will give considerable insight into the author's careful methods of work. There was little enthusiasm over the ode in its early form, and it was severely criticised in the Press. Tennyson was much gratified by Henry Taylor's approval—"It has a greatness worthy of its theme, and an absolute simplicity and truth, with all the poetic passion of your nature moving beneath"—and replying, wrote: "Thanks! thanks! In the all but universal depreciation of my ode by the Press, the prompt and hearty approval of it by a man as true as the Duke himself is doubly grateful." The second edition, published in 1853, was greatly altered and extended, and further improvements were introduced before its reappearance in the Maud volume of 1856. The following lines in the first were omitted in all the subsequent editions:

"Perchance our greatness will increase;
Perchance a darkening future yields
Some reverse from worse to worse,
The blood of men in quiet fields,
And sprinkled on the sheaves of peace."

In this year the poet's eldest son, Hallam, was born at Twickenham, and in the following year the family removed to Farringford, in Freshwater. The lanes and breezy downs, the meadow and wood and views of sea of the Farringford district form the background of his later poetic descriptions, as the flats and level wastes and marshes of Lincolnshire had done in the earlier. In his poetic invitation to the Rev. F. D. Maurice, on the occasion of his expulsion from King's College, London, Tennyson accurately describes the surroundings of his home in the Isle of Wight :

“ Where, far from noise and smoke of town,
I watch the twilight falling brown
All round a careless-order'd garden
Close to the ridge of a noble down.

“ For groves of pine on either hand,
To break the blast of winter, stand ;
And further on, the hoary Channel
Tumbles a billow on chalk and sand.”

Here, where Lionel, his second son, was born in 1854, Tennyson lived until 1870. In 1853 appeared the eighth edition of the Poems and the fifth edition of the Princess, which, like the Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington, had undergone many alterations and editions. In 1853 he was asked whether he would permit his name to be put forward for the Lord Rectorship of the University of Edinburgh, but declined. In 1854* appeared in the Examiner (December 9) the first draught of The Charge of the Light Brigade, a poem of which three versions are extant. The final version appeared as a separate publication, with the following note by the author :

“Having heard that the brave soldiers before Sebastopol, whom I am proud to call my countrymen, have a liking for my ballad on the Charge of the Light Brigade at Balaclava, I have ordered a thousand copies of it to be printed for them. No writing of mine can add to the glory they have acquired in the Crimea ; but if what I have heard be true, they will not be displeased to receive these copies of the ballad from me, and to know that those who sit at home love and honour them.

“ August 8, 1855.

ALFRED TENNYSON.”

“The people’s voice” was never more distinctly heard than in the poetry of Tennyson written in times of grave national anxiety. His sympathy with popular feeling, as here, aroused by the war in the Crimea, was closer and deeper, aristocratic poet though he was, than that of any poet of the democracy that England has yet seen.

In May, 1855, the year of the publication of Maud, the honorary degree of D.C.L. was conferred on the Poet Laureate by the University of Oxford. Of all

Tennyson’s poems, Maud was received with the least favour ; it was severely criticised in Blackwood (September), and the National Review (October), and a hot controversy ensued over its merits and demerits. An “Anti Maud, by a Poet of the People,” appeared and ran into a second edition. The germ of Maud, “a drama of the soul,” is to be found in the lines, “O, that ’twere possible,” contributed in 1837 to the Tribute, and it is on record that its genesis may be traced to a remark of Sir John Simeon* (Tennyson’s friend and neighbour), to the effect that the lines suggested a story which ought to be told. The poem was mainly composed in Sir John Simeon’s garden at Swainston. Though the author’s favourite poem, Maud has never taken firm hold of the popular imagination, and only a few of the more eminent critics have spoken enthusiastically in its favour. Chief among the charges made against it is that of obscurity, a charge which can, however, with difficulty be maintained. The best-known vindication of Maud, a reply to the animadversions of the critics, was published by Dr. Mann (1856), and is of special interest as approved by Tennyson himself. In a letter to the author, Tennyson wrote: "No one with this essay before him can in future pretend to misunderstand my dramatic poem, Maud; your commentary is as true as it is full." Rightly understood, Maud will be taken as a proof of the real range and fertility of Tennyson's lyric power. More truly dramatic than any of his poems composed in the traditional form of the drama, it serves to display the character of his genius, which was capable of the development of intense individual moods such as he could realise in his own person, and their presentation in the emphatic form of subtly modulated lyric verse. In a monodrama whose action unfolds itself in a series of lyric poems, his intense individualism was a source of strength, just as it was a source of indisputable weakness when he essayed a great dramatic theme in Queen Mary and Harold.

Maud was the poem which the author most frequently chose to read aloud.* Perhaps the most interesting occasion upon which it was so read was in the September of 1855; Robert Browning and his wife were present, and Dante Gabriel Rossetti. Rossetti made a pen-and-ink sketch of the poet as he declaimed his verses, which is still preserved. Tennyson is sketched seated on the sofa, in a loose coat. and the right holds the book. Of Tennyson's reading, several descriptions have been given. It seems to have been a kind of chant, guided by the music of the verse rather than by the sense of the words, and in this way a striking contrast to Browning's, whose stress of voice was not intended to be musical, but indicative of the meaning. The contrast is significant as interpreting in the case of each poet his conception of the aim of his own art. "I rather need to know what he is reading," said Sir Henry Taylor of Tennyson, "for otherwise I find sense to be lost in sound from time to time."

Two American men of letters have left interesting records of their personal impressions of Tennyson during 1857. Bayard Taylor was the poet's guest at Farringford, and walked with him over the cliffs to the Needles. "I was struck," he wrote, "by the variety of his knowledge. Not a little flower on the downs escaped his notice, and the geology of the coast, both terrestrial and submarine, was perfectly familiar to him. I thought of a remark I once heard from a distinguished English author (Thackeray), that Tennyson was the wisest man he knew." Of the outward man he spoke as "Tall and broad-shouldered as a son of Anak, with hair, beard, and eyes of Southern darkness." * Hawthorne found the poet "as un-English as possible," though not American in appearance. "I cannot well describe the difference, but there was something more mellow in him, softer, sweeter, broader, more simple than we are apt to be." †

It may be noted here that Whittier, a warm admirer of Tennyson's poetry, wrote to him in 1885 to ask for some memorial verses for the cenotaph of Gordon—a request which produced the well-known stanza beginning :

“ Warrior of God, man's friend”—

Some years later he wrote to Walt Whitman an acknowledgment of the gift of that poet's photograph :

“ DEAR WALT WHITMAN : I thank you for your kind thought of me. I value the photograph much, and I wish that I could see not only this sun picture, excellent as I am told it is, but also the living original. May he still live and flourish for many years to be. The coming year (1888) should give new life to every American who has breathed a breath of that soul which inspired the great founders of the American Constitution, whose work you are to celebrate. Truly the mother country, pondering on this, may feel that how much soever the daughter owes to her, she, the mother, has nevertheless something to learn from the daughter. Especially I would note the care taken to guard a noble Constitution from rash and unwise innovators.”

This year (1857) saw in print,* though it never was published, the first of the series of poems dealing with the Arthurian cycle of legends which we now possess under the single title Idylls of the King. For long Tennyson's mind had been occupied upon the material for poetic treatment lying unused in the ancient British romances. In every volume published by him appear traces of their influence upon his imagination. The Lady of Shalott, Sir Galahad, and Morte d'Arthur were pieces of exquisite jewel work such as a consummate artist alone could have achieved, but they were little more than beautiful fragments, and the subject demanded a larger treatment. The poet, too, had now other ideals in poetry than those which had floated before his youthful mind. Not yet had his work given proof of the architectonic power of the masters, and he had earned the right to enter the lists with them for the highest prize. It had been left for a nineteenth-century poet to attempt the authentic English epic, the great national poem unifying the deeds of the great national hero of Britain's legendary age. The development of Tennyson's poem was very gradual. In 1859 appeared Enid, Vivien, Elaine, and Guinevere in a volume of which ten thousand copies were sold within a few weeks. At long intervals from this year until 1885, the date of Balin and Balan, was built up, book by book, the poem of Arthur and the Round Table. An expectant but critical audience received the first volume with mingled feelings of admiration and disappointment. Longfellow wrote in his diary : "Finished the four idyls. The first and third (Enid and Elaine) could have only come from a great poet. The second and fourth (Vivien and Guinevere) do not seem to me so good." Carlyle was more outspoken in his dissatisfaction. In a letter to Emerson he wrote : "We read at first Tennyson's Idylls with profound recognition of the finely elaborated execution, and also of the inward perfection of vacancy, and, to say truth, with considerable impatience at being treated so very like infants, though the lollipops were so superlative. We gladly changed for one of Emerson's English Traits." Fitzgerald, one of Tennyson's oldest friends, shared the disappointment, but for different reasons from Carlyle's. Tennyson's poetic progress had been in his judgment a deterioration. The early poems, Fitzgerald's first love, had been added to indeed, but not outshone. Of In Memoriam, though he spoke admiringly, he confessed that for him it had "the sense of being evolved by a poetic machine of the highest order," and of The Princess he wrote to Frederick Tennyson : "I am considered a great heretic for abusing it ; it seems to me a wretched waste of power at a time when a man ought to be doing his best ; and I almost feel hopeless about Alfred now—I mean about his doing what he was born to do." When the Idylls appeared he said : "I wish I had secured more leaves from that old 'Butcher's Book' torn up in old Spedding's rooms in 1842, when the press went to work with, I think, the last of old Alfred's best." Without literally endorsing Fitzgerald's mournful verdict, the majority of the good critics sorrowed over Tennyson's desertion of the field in which his early laurels had been reaped for the excursion into epic territory, and the regret was even more unanimous and widespread when he essayed drama. His reputation indisputably suffered during these epic and dramatic periods, and was not altogether restored even by the publication in 1880 of Ballads and Other Poems in his seventieth year, described by Theodore Watts as "the most richly various volume of English poetry that has appeared in this century."

A personal note in connexion with a passage in The Holy Grail may here find a place :

" Let visions of the night or of the day
Come as they will ; and many a time they come.

Until this earth he walks on seems not earth,
 This light that strikes his eyeball is not light,
 This air that strikes his forehead is not air
 But vision—yea, his very hand and foot—
 In moments when he feels he cannot die,
 And knows himself no vision to himself,
 Nor the high God a vision, nor that One
 Who rose again.”*

Here, and, as will be presently noted, elsewhere in his poetry Tennyson describes a mental state which was one frequently present in his own experience. He describes it as follows (May 7, 1874): “I have never had any revelations through anæsthetics, but a kind of waking trance (this for lack of a better name) I have frequently had quite up from my boyhood, when I have been all alone. This has often come to me through repeating my own name to myself silently, till, all at once, as it were, out of the intensity of the consciousness of my individuality, the individuality itself seemed to resolve and fade away into boundless being, and this not a confused state, but the clearest of the clearest, the surest of the surest, utterly beyond words, where death was an almost laughable impossibility. The loss of personality (if so it were) seeming no extinction, but the only true life.”

In The Ancient Sage we have an exact reproduction of this description in verse :

“ For more than once when I
 Sat all alone, revolving in myself
 The word that is the symbol of myself,
 The mortal limit of the Self was loosed,
 And past into the Nameless, as a cloud
 Melts into Heaven. I touch’d my limbs, the limbs
 Were strange, not mine—and yet no shade of doubt,
 But utter clearness, and thro’ loss of self

* “These three lines,” said Tennyson, “are the (spiritually) central lines in the Idylls.”

The gain of such large life as match'd with ours
Were sun to spark—unshadowable in words,
Themselves but shadows of a shadow-world."

A similar account of trance-like state is quoted by Mr. Knowles from a conversation of Tennyson's : *
" Sometimes as I sit here alone in this great room I get carried away out of sense and body and rapt into mere existence, till the accidental touch or movement of one of my own fingers is like a great shock and blow, and brings the body back with a terrible start." With these experiences we may compare that delineated in the ninety-fifth section of In Memoriam.

" So word by word, and line by line
The dead man touch'd me from the past,
And all at once it seem'd at last
The living soul was flash'd on mine,

" And mine in his was wound and whirl'd
About empyreal heights of thought,
And came on that which is, and caught
The deep pulsations of the world."

In 1859 Tennyson's strong patriotic sentiment once more found expression in verse, this time inspired by the volunteer movement, the outcome of a period of political unrest and the feeling of the necessity of provision for national defence. The Times of March 9 printed The War (best known as Riflemen, Form !), a poem known to be by the Laureate, though unacknowledged by him. Tennyson's interest in the volunteer force was keen and sustained. In 1867 he wrote to the late Colonel Richards : " I most heartily congratulate you on your having been able to do so much for your country ; and I hope that you will not cease from your labours until it is the law of the land that every man child in it shall be trained to the use of arms."

After the first volume of the Idylls of the King, Tennyson took another new departure in Sea Dreams, which, with Enoch Arden and Aylmer's Field, is an essay, not altogether successful, in decorative treatment of subjects taken from modern English life. His extraordinary versatility—at once a strength and a weakness—appears in the comparison of these poems with Tithonus, contributed at Thackeray's request to Cornhill, the magazine of which he was at the time editor, and written in the same year as Sea Dreams. In the former we have a faultless rendering of one of the most beautiful of the classic myths, deepened and widened in its spiritual and moral significance, subdued in tone yet full of exquisite colour—in short, a poem in which Tennyson's genius displays itself in its most commanding presence; in the other, as in Enoch Arden, the embroidered splendours of the form only serve to belittle or remove into the region of fantastic unreality the substance of the poem.

In 1859, accompanied by his friend, Professor Palgrave, Tennyson visited Portugal, and in 1861 revisited the Pyrenees, whither in 1830, with Arthur Hallam, he had made the enthusiastic revolutionary excursion of his youth. It was on this occasion that the lines In the Valley of Caunteretz,* commemorating that early journey, were composed. In 1864 Garibaldi was a visitor at Farringford. As a memorial of his visit, and at Mrs. Tennyson's request, he planted in the grounds, already beautiful with ilex and cedar, a Wellingtonia gigantea. In the Demeter volume, Tennyson, in a poem to W. G. Palgrave (To Ulysses), makes a graceful reference to the visit and the memorial act :

“ Or watch the waving pine which here
The warrior of Caprera set,
A name that earth will not forget
Till Earth has rolled her latest year.”

Except for such visits, occasional journeys abroad, and the publication of his poems, the Laureate's long life, like that of most men of letters, was a life of uneventful years. In 1869 the even tenour of the home at Farringford was exchanged during the summer and autumn months for Aldworth, a house built for the poet from designs by Mr. J. T. Knowles on the borders of Sussex, near the village of Haslemere. Partly to provide a secluded retreat where, in his increasing horror of hero-worshippers, he might have a certain refuge, and partly for the sake of Mrs. Tennyson's health, the change was made. As the years wore on Tennyson bore with decreasing patience the penalty of fame, and his dislike of publicity * may have had something to do with his refusal of a baronetcy twice offered him, in 1873, and again in 1874.

The Laureate's contribution about this time to the “Eyre Defence Fund” occasioned much popular indignation. Eyre had entered Louth Grammar School shortly after the Tennysons left for Cambridge, and had in later life come prominently before the public eye by his prompt and decisive suppression of an insurrection among the natives in Jamaica, where he was stationed. A charge of wanton cruelty was preferred against Eyre by a large and influential body of religious sentimentalists ; and the action of Carlyle, Kingsley, Ruskin, and Tennyson in subscribing to a fund for his defence produced an almost fierce resentment. The Laureate's letter on the occasion is of more than passing interest: "I sent my small subscription as a tribute to the nobleness of the man, and as a protest against the spirit in which a servant of the State, who has saved to us one of the islands of the Empire and many English lives, seems to be hunted down. . . . In the mean time, the outbreak of our Indian Mutiny remains as a warning to all but madmen against want of vigour and swift decisiveness."*

Of the lesser poems written by Tennyson during his epic and dramatic periods, by far the most remarkable is Lucretius. I am not sure that the poet's highest reach is not attained in this, the most splendid of his masterly studies of classical subjects. No other poem displays his best qualities in such powerful combination, in such flawless perfection. Admirably balanced, magnificent in its metrical movement, and in its final version closed by perhaps the most dramatic touch in all Tennyson's poetry, it marks in my judgment the high-water mark of his achievement. Among his other poems there may be found some to equal, none, I think, to surpass it.

In 1868 Henry Wadsworth Longfellow visited Tennyson at Farringford, whither the most distinguished visitors to England now made a pilgrimage. An account of an expedition to the newly built and inaccessible Aldworth, made about this time by a party of guests, is given by Lord Houghton, one of their number :

* Life of E. J. Eyre, late Governor of Jamaica, by Hamilton Hume.

"Our expedition to Tennyson's was a moral success, but a physical failure ; for we had so bad a pair of posters that we regularly knocked up seven miles from the house, and should have had to walk there in the moonlight, if we had not met with a London cab. The bard was very agreeable, and his wife and son delightful. He has built himself a very handsome and commodious house in a most inaccessible site, with every comfort he can require, and every discomfort to all who approach him. What can be more poetical ?"

That in his poetry he had built himself an imperishable monument was never, it seems, a settled conviction in Tennyson's mind. He was often visited by doubts regarding the enduring quality of his poetical achievement. Looking on The Dramas. one occasion at Aldworth, in company with its architect, Mr. Knowles, he said, "That house will last longer than I shall. It will last five hundred years." Ambitious to try his hand in the highest department of literature, and uncertain how the work already done might fare at the hands of time, Tennyson, led by the irony of fate, gave up some of the best years of his life to the composition of dramatic poetry, to which his genius cannot be said to have inclined him, and in which he certainly attained no crown of lavish praise. Fine as are occasional passages and dramatic as are many of the scenes in Queen Mary, Harold, and Becket, these plays are essentially poems upon which a dramatic form has been impressed, but impressed unconvincingly. Neither in action nor in presentation of character are we persuaded that they are dramatically conceived.

Queen Mary, the play in which the author thought his character drawing at its best, was produced by Mr. Irving at the Lyceum in April 1876.* In spite of the excellence of the stage management, the representation was a failure. Harold, in some respects a play of better construction for stage purposes, although absolutely inferior as poetry, followed, but in published form only, and has never been acted.

But in the very hour of his failure as a dramatist Tennyson was engaged upon poems which were to prove how great an error he made in deserting the field best suited to his genius, and how much greater was the error of the critics who saw visible decline writ large upon his later work. "Eh ! he has got the grip of it," cried Carlyle when the ballad of The Revenge was read to him ; and many another friend, dissatisfied with the epic and the dramas, rejoiced over the marvellous virility of the verse collected in the volume entitled Ballads and Other Poems of 1880. This book was the first sign of the gorgeous Indian summer which was to diffuse its golden splendours over the remainder of Tennyson's career, and to end only with his life. For his genius there lay in wait no "winter of pale misfeature."

In April, 1879, Charles Tennyson Turner† died. At Grasby, where he had been rector, he left behind him many affectionate memories, and to the world of letters a reputation not indeed of such far-shining brilliance as his brother, but of tender and enduring ray. A collected edition of his poems, with Alfred's prefatory memorial lines "At Midnight," was published in the year following that of his death. Frederick, the eldest of this poetic brotherhood, still lives,

* Tennyson thought Irving's Philip comparable to Salvini's Othello.

† The name "Turner" was taken under the will of a relation.

the author of many poems which, bearing any name but that of Tennyson, might have made the name illustrious.

In The Falcon, 1879, called by Fanny Kemble "an exquisite little poem in action," the Laureate again essayed success as a dramatist, this time with a vastly less ambitious play; a mere graceful poetic setting of a plot from Boccaccio, the ninth novel of the fifth day of his Decameron. The Falcon, too, like its predecessors, failed, and it was not until the production of a short tragedy of undoubted merit, The Cup, that success rewarded Tennyson's persevering efforts in the dramatic form. This play owed its public favour in some degree to the actors and to the management under which it was produced in a style of profuse magnificence.

In 1880 Tennyson was invited to become a candidate for the Lord Rectorship of the University of Glasgow, but declined the honour of a nomination on hearing that he was to be the candidate of the Conservative Party, in the following terms: "I only consented to stand for your Lord Rectorship when informed by the letter of introduction which your agreeable deputation brought, that my nomination was 'supported by a large majority, if not the totality of the students of Glasgow.' It now seems necessary that I should, by standing at your invitation, appear, what I have steadfastly refused to be—a party candidate for the Conservative Club. . . . You are probably aware that some years ago the Glasgow Liberals asked me to be their candidate, and that I, in like manner, declined; yet I would gladly accept a nomination, after what has occurred on this occasion, if at any time a body of students, bearing no political party name, should wish to nominate me, or if both Liberals and Conservatives should ever happen to agree in foregoing the excitement of a political contest, and in desiring a Lord Rector who would not appear for installation, and who would, in fact, be a mere roi fainéant, with nothing but the literary merits you are good enough to appreciate."

The note struck by Tennyson in the Ballads and Other Poems was a fuller, richer, deeper note than had yet been heard in his poetry. The voice that spoke in it was a manlier voice. The dreamy melody of the verse of his youth had given place to a more strenuous music and themes of graver human interest. Had his career closed before 1880, it might fairly have been said of him that he had given the best he had to give, that nothing more was to be expected. There is not, I think, in the history of literature so signal an example of poetic power steadily advancing in strength and compass through so long a life, and until its very close. Or if there be, to find a parallel we shall need to journey far: Tennyson is only matched by Sophocles.

In 1882, under the direction of Mrs. Bernard Beere, The Promise of May, Tennyson's fifth drama—a prose one this time—was produced at the Globe Theatre, and proved a luckless failure. It was popularly though wrongly supposed* that, in the character of 'Edgar,' Tennyson intended to pourtray the ordinary agnostic, and the portrait was regarded as unnecessarily insulting. Much excitement was caused on the fourth night of the representation by an interruption from

* In a letter to Mr. Hall Caine, Tennyson wrote: "I meant Edgar to be a shallow enough theorist. I never could have thought that he would have been taken for an 'ordinary freethinker.'" the Marquis of Queensberry, who rose in the theatre and exclaimed, "I am an agnostic, and I protest against Mr. Tennyson's gross caricature of our creed."

The transient decline in popularity produced by this play and by the general ill success of Tennyson's dramas, was increased when, on his return from a yachting cruise to Copenhagen with Mr. Gladstone, he accepted a peerage. The Poet-Peer's attendance at the debates in the House of Lords was very rare ; on one occasion he took part in a division, voting for a measure in extension of the franchise ; on another he paired in favour of the "Deceased Wife's Sister" bill.

The Laureate's sixth drama, Becket, was published in 1884. It is pleasing to record the graceful act of courtesy done his old friend, Mr. Aubrey de Vere, in connexion with its composition. "He would not write it," says Mr. de Vere in a private letter, "till he ascertained from me (my Thomas of Canterbury had been published a few years earlier) that, so far from being annoyed at his writing on the same great man, I should much rejoice at it."

Of the remaining years of Tennyson's life there is little for the unofficial biographer to record save the publication of successive volumes of a veteran poet's verse, which never lost its charm, while it grew in power and drew at last to an almost triumphant close. It is good to think that Tennyson, like Shakespere, in his latest work delivered a message of hope to the human race, a message even prophetic in its tone of deep and solemn assurance. The Tiresias volume (1885), fitly dedicated to Robert Browning, contained among many noble and striking poems one in particular, The Ancient Sage, which, to me at least, seems to sum up all that is noblest and best in the life-teaching of Tennyson.

It is of interest to note that in this year he expressed his opinion in very definite language of the proposal to disestablish the English State Church. "I believe," he wrote, "that the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church would prelude the downfall of much that is greatest and best in England."* Tennyson was given to expressing his opinions strongly and with no uncertain note. When the news of the persecution of the Russian Jews reached England in 1891, "I can only say," he wrote, "that Russia has disgraced her church and her nationality. I once met the Czar. He seemed a kind and good-natured man. I can scarcely believe that he is fully aware of the barbarities perpetrated with his apparent sanction."

In 1886 Lionel Tennyson died on his voyage home from fever contracted in India, where he had been as a member of the Viceroy's staff. His death was the one great trial of the poet's declining years, and is the main theme of the pathetic poem dedicating the Demeter volume (1889) to the Marquis of Dufferin and Ava.

" For he—your India was his Fate,
And drew him over sea to you—
He fain had ranged her thro' and thro'
To serve her myriads and the State.

* * * * *

" But while my life's late eve endures,
Nor settles into hueless grey,
My memories of his briefer day
Will mix with love for you and yours."

* Letter to Mr. Bosworth Smith.

Among the visitors to Farringford and Haslemere during the last years of Tennyson's life were his old friends, the Duke of Argyll, Professor Jowett, and Mr. Theodore Watts, and from across the Atlantic journeyed a welcome guest in Oliver Wendell Holmes. Just before his own death in December, 1889, Browning wrote his last letter to Tennyson on the occasion of the Laureate's eightieth birthday :

“MY DEAR TENNYSON : To-morrow is your birthday, indeed a memorable one. Let me say I associate myself with the universal pride of our country in your glory, and in its hope that for many and many a year we may have your very self among us—secure that your poetry will be a wonder and delight to all those appointed to come after. And for my own part, let me further say, I have loved you dearly. May God bless you and yours.”

The closing years of Tennyson's life found him beloved, honoured, venerated by an inner circle of close friends, amongst whose names appear almost all those of his distinguished contemporaries, and by an ever-widening circle of readers in the English-speaking countries, for whom he stood as the truest interpreter of the thought and sentiment of his age. His poems were read with equal pleasure in the scholar's study, in the poor man's cottage, and in the palaces of kings. Tennyson was no less at home in the society of the artizan or labourer than in that of men of rank or scholarship, and the natural directness and simple humanity which distinguished his character are perhaps nowhere better displayed than in his relations with the Queen, between whom and the poet there existed for many years a close bond of sympathy and affection, without a trace of patronage on the one side or of mere conventional loyalty on the other. The Queen's womanliness, the poet's manliness, shine through all the records of their conversation and correspondence.

Versatile and graceful to the last, even in fields remote from that of his power, he published in 1892 his last drama, The Foresters, a romantic pastoral play, which achieved a brilliant success when produced by Mr. Daly in New York, with Miss Ada Rehan as Maid Marian. Sherwood Forest, Robin Hood, Maid Marian, and the life under the greenwood tree must have conveyed something of the charm of English country life in the olden time to American audiences, whose ancestors' life indeed it was.

But the harp from whose magic strings flowed the ever-varying, ever-melodious music that had seemed in English ears the sweetest of its time, was soon to be silent. In the autumn of 1892, but a few weeks before the publication of The Death of Ænone and Akbar's Dream, rumours were heard of the poet's illness, and on October 6, before dawn, but in a room flooded with the quiet moonlight, the end came. He was buried among his peers and beside his friend, Robert Browning, in Poets' Corner, Westminster Abbey.

CHAPTER II.

IN the spring of 1827, Charles and Alfred Tennyson were partners in a literary venture. The preface to the volume, which had for motto the line from Martial, stated that the “poems were written from the ages of fifteen to eighteen, not conjointly, but individually.” In Messrs. Macmillan’s edition of 1893 the preface by Hallam, Lord Tennyson, contains the further information obtained from his father that he (Alfred) was between fifteen and seventeen when the poems were written, his brother Charles between fifteen and eighteen, and that four poems now signed “F. T.” were by Frederick Tennyson, the eldest brother. In this latter edition the initials, supplied by Frederick Tennyson, of the supposed authors, either “A. T.” or “C. T.,” are appended to each of the poems, but we are warned that there is no certainty as to the authorship in individual cases.* Without the help of the initials, however, and despite the fact that the music now familiar as Tennysonian is nowhere to be heard in the book, there is little difficulty in determining the work of each author.

“ Ilæc nos novimus esse nihil,”

* Some additional poems are for the first time printed in this edition. They belonged to the original MS. of 1827, but were omitted for some forgotten reason.

After one perusal I was struck by the fact that the more ambitious poems are the work of one hand, and that hand is proved to be Alfred's by the occasional phrases to be met with which appear again in his later poetry—as, for example, in this volume, in the poem entitled Egypt, occur these lines:

“ The first glitter of his rising beam Falls on the broad-based pyramids sublime;”

and in A Fragment, published by Alfred in the Gem in 1830, these occur :

“ Yet endure unscathed
Of changeful cycles, the great Pyramids
Broad-based amid the fleeting sands.”

And here in Oriana the lines,

“ Winds were blowing, waters flowing,
We heard the steeds to battle going,
Oriana ;
Aloud the hollow bugle blowing,
Oriana,”

echo a similar movement in the Vale of Bones :

“ When on to battle proudly going,
Your plumage to the wild winds blowing,
Your tartans far behind ye flowing.”

I have noticed a number of these similarities and resemblances, and think it would be no difficult task to pick out with tolerable certainty the poems by Alfred from among the one hundred and two poems of which the volume is composed. The vein of feeling in Charles's poems is more tranquil, more domestic, and the themes chosen far less difficult. Alfred is the bolder adventurer, and ranges further in his search for subjects. His work seems to express a more deliberate determination to be poetic, and effort is more distinctly characteristic of his contributions to the book than those of Charles, which may be unhesitatingly described as by comparison spontaneous and natural. It may at once be said that there is no mark of distinction, no promise of future greatness in these poems. They are rather, indeed, remarkable for the absence of the puerility one might naturally expect to be somewhere betrayed in a series of such youthful efforts, than by any positive qualities. Many of the poems written by Alfred Tennyson in later years, such as, for example, The Skipping-Rope or The English War Song (of 1830), reach a lower deep of inanity than any printed in this first volume. For the rest an acquaintance with the poetry of the world such as few schoolboys can boast is plentifully exhibited in the mottoes prefixed to most of the verses. The Latin poets, Lucretius, Virgil, Horace, are laid under contribution; Milton, Gray, Byron, Scott, and Moore among English poets; and occasional prose authors are represented—in short, a goodly company—among which, of course, the English writers, and Byron in particular, predominate. The boys, and it is significant when we attempt to fix for ourselves the place which the future will assign to Alfred Tennyson—the boys were cradled into poetry by the best poets of the world. The determination to be poets preceded any true poetic faculty, and in Alfred's case we must regard that determination, leading as it did to lifelong, indefatigable labour in the effort to obtain an artist's command over his medium, an artist's mastery in technique, as in large measure the power which, joined with the true poetic vision of later years, made him the poet he eventually became.

The versification and metrical movement of this early verse are, of course, entirely derivative ; Byron's Hebrew Melodies and Moore's Irish Melodies supply much of the inspiration. The boys had indeed, as Coleridge said of Alfred, "begun to write poetry without very well understanding what metre was," and this volume is composed of a series of imitative metrical essays. Imitative they are, however, in a catholic spirit, no one model being exclusively followed.

The only notice of the book in which the brothers "crossed the Rubicon" together, as they expressed it in the preface, appeared in The Literary Chronicle and Weekly Review (May 19, 1827). "This little volume," remarked the writer, "exhibits a pleasing union of kindred tastes, and contains several little pieces of considerable merit."

In the first year of his Cambridge residence Tennyson was a candidate for the Chancellor's Medal in English Verse—the subject Timbuctoo. Among his rivals were Monckton Milnes and Arthur Hallam. Hallam's poem, composed in the terza rima of Dante, may be read in the Poems of volume of his Remains in Verse and Prose, 1830. published in 1834. Tennyson's poem is now accessible in Messrs. Macmillan's edition of Poems by Two Brothers, to which it forms a natural conclusion. The exercises were submitted to the University Examiners in April, and upon June 12, 1829, the following announcement appeared in the Cambridge Chronicle and Journal: "On Saturday last the Chancellor's Gold Medal for the best English poem by a resident undergraduate was adjudged to Alfred Tennyson, of Trinity College." This is the first public mention of the name of Alfred Tennyson in connexion with poetry. In the Athenæum of July 22, a very flattering notice of the prize poem appeared. "We have accustomed ourselves," wrote the reviewer (perhaps John Sterling or Frederick Maurice, at that time the joint editors), "to think, perhaps without any very good reason, that poetry was likely to perish among us for a considerable period after the great generation of poets which is now passing away. The age seems determined to contradict us, and that in the most decided manner ; for it has put forth poetry by a young man, and that where we should least expect it—namely, in a prize poem. These productions have often been ingenious and elegant, but we have never before seen one of them which indicated really first-rate poetical genius, and which would have done honour to any man that ever wrote. Such, we do not hesitate to affirm, is the little work before us ; and the examiners seem to have felt it like ourselves, for they have assigned the prize to its author, though the measure in which he writes was never before, we believe, thus selected for honour." The measure here referred to was blank verse, a bold experiment on Tennyson's part, the traditions being all in favour of the heroic couplet. I have little doubt, however, that, so far from attenuating his chance of success by his choice of metre, Tennyson really increased it ; the novelty of the measure calling attention to and emphasizing the novelty of method and manner conspicuous in the poem. Without echoing the high praise of the Athenæum reviewer, it is not too much to say that Timbuctoo is a very remarkable prize exercise, vague indeed in its general conception and purpose, but indisputably original; the first English poem to mark the direction in which the richly decorative art of Keats was to find its development. Written very shortly after the Poems by Two Brothers, it is a surprising advance in poetic technique. The obviously imitative measures of his boyhood poems are forgotten, and Tennyson has found himself. The music is the familiar music that we associate with his name—

“ Where are ye,
Thrones of the Western wave, fair Islands green?
Where are your moonlight halls, your cedarn glooms,
The blossoming abysses of your hills?
Your flowering capes, and your gold-sanded bays,
Blown round with happy airs of odorous winds?”

The inspiration here, as indeed throughout, is essentially Keats; read Hyperion and you have traced this manner to its fount. The influence of Wordsworth, traceable in some of his later poems, is not yet visible, nor was there anything either of Wordsworth, the revealer, or Wordsworth, the unconscious artist, grand in the bare simplicity of his style, in Tennyson at any period of his poetic history. They may be taken as representatives of methods in poetry mutually exclusive. If Wordsworth was a great poet, he was a great poet by reason of his revelation, by reason of the truth and the beauty of his thought when it crystallised in a perfect and inevitable because a quietly natural form of expression. If Tennyson was a great poet, it was because, like Pope, he could set forth a philosophy and adorn a pathetic tale in a more graceful and more appropriate key of words than any man of his time; and, what Pope could not do, give lyric expression to intense individual moods with almost the passionate power of Burns, and an intellectual precision not at all times attained by Shelley. Essentially a lyrist, and original only in his presentation of his own moods or states of feeling, Tennyson, when he travelled beyond the range of his own experience, was a scholarly and accomplished versifier, a later Pope, who from among the ideas current at the time selected the best, and gave them out again in his own elegant and exquisite version. Difficile est proprie communia dicere.

The rich and dreamy melodies, the alternate languor and swiftness of emotion, and the subtleties of its delineation, displayed in Poems, Chiefly Lyrical, at once exercised a fascination over the sensitive temperaments of the young men who were readers of poetry in 1830. Verse like this, from the first poem in the volume, Claribel, was a source of new and delightful sensations :

“ At eve the beetle boometh
 Athwart the thicket lone :
 At noon the wild bee hummeth
 About the moss'd headstone ;
 At midnight the moon cometh,
 And looketh down alone.
 Her song the lintwhite swelleth,
 The clear-voiced mavis dwelleth,
 The callow throistle lispeth,
 The slumbrous wave outwelleth,
 The babbling runnel crispeth,
 The hollow grot replieth
 Where Claribel low lieth.”*

* In Henry Alford's journal there are some interesting references to the brothers Tennyson. Referring to Alfred's "Poems" of 1830, and Charles's Sonnets and Fugitive Pieces, published the same year, he wrote :

“ Oct. 12, 1830. Looked over both the Tennysons' Poems at

It was a new departure in English poetry ; there had been nothing like it before ; and although the intellectual equipment of the author, so far as revealed in the poetry, was really of the slightest, and although some of the poems were hardly worthy of a place in any printed book, curiosity and admiration were aroused, and an interest excited in the personality of the new poet. The best and most characteristic poems in this volume were Claribel, Mariana, Isabel, Adeline, Oriana,* The Dying Swan, A Character, The Poet, The Poet's Mind, and Circumstance. There were fifty-three poems in all, of which almost half (twenty-five) were afterwards suppressed, a few being restored to places in the collected editions of later life. The following is a list of the suppressed poems : Elegiacs ; The How and the Why ; Supposed Confessions of a Second-rate Sensitive Mind not in Unity with Itself ; The Burial of Love ; To Juliet ; Songs (three) ; Hero to Leander ; The Mystic ; The Grasshopper ; Love, Pride, and Forgetfulness ; Chorus in an Unpublished Drama, written very early ; Lost Hope ; The Tears of Heaven ; Love and Sorrow ; To a Lady Sleeping ; Sonnets ; Love ; The Kraken ; English War Song ; National Song ; Dualisms ; We are Free, οἱ ῥέοντες. Tennyson's judgments on his own poems, unlike those of Wordsworth, were almost unerring, and, as a consequence, the incessant revision to which his work was subjected rarely failed to be happily effective. How finely some of his poems were retouched may here be illustrated by per-night ; exquisite fellows. I know no two books of poetry which have given me so much pure pleasure as their works ;" and again later :

haps the palmary example. In its first version, the closing line of Lucretius read :

“ What matters ? All is over : Fare thee well ”

—a line weak in itself, and weaker as the conclusion of so matchless and dramatic a reproduction of the classic story. In its later form the last words of Lucretius catch up in questioning echo his wife's despairing cry “ as having failed in duty to him,” and once again the unsolved problem of his philosophic life shapes itself anew, the ruling passion strong even in violent and untimely death

“ Thy duty ? What is duty ? Fare thee well ! ”

The Poems of 1830 were praised by Hallam and Leigh Hunt, but severely handled by Christopher North in Blackwood. So far there had been no unanimity among the critics as to the rank to be assigned the representative of the new school of poetry. At the same time, it was evident The “Poems” that the younger generation was in his of 1832. favour, and in 1832 Tennyson put forth another volume of lyrics in which the distinctive characteristics of his style were still more strongly marked. Hallam's criticism—“ the author imitates nobody ”—made in his review of the 1830 Poems in the Englishman's Magazine, was even more strictly true of this second volume. Subtly indefinite as many of the pieces were, the very absence of definite meaning lent them the magic of suggestiveness which captivated many minds. “ I am not sure,” wrote Edgar Allan Poe, “ that Tennyson is not the greatest of poets. . . . There are passages in his works which rivet a conviction I had long entertained, that the indefinite is an element in the true ποιησις. Why do some persons fatigue themselves in endeavours to unravel such phantasy pieces as The Lady of Shalott? As well unweave the ventum textilem. If the author did not deliberately propose to himself a suggestive indefiniteness of meaning, with the view of bringing about a definiteness of vague and therefore of spiritual effect—this, at least, arose from the silent analytical promptings of that poetic genius which, in its supreme development, embodies all orders of intellectual capacity.”* In that musical dream, The Lady of Shalott,† in the subtile mod-

* New York Democratic Review, December, 1844.

† The original version of this poem differs from the final in sixty or seventy lines. The following was the concluding stanza in the early edition :

“ They crossed themselves, their stars they blest,
 Knight, minstrel, abbot, squire, and guest ;
 There lay a parchment on her breast,
 That puzzled more than all the rest
 The well-fed wits at Camelot.
 ‘ The web was woven curiously,
 The charm is broken utterly ;
 Draw near and fear not, this is I,
 The Lady of Shalott.’ ”

How Tennyson could polish a pebble until it became a gem is nowhere better illustrated than by a comparison of this with the following stanza :

“ Who is this ? and what is here ?
 And in the lighted palace near
 Died the sound of royal cheer ;
 And they cross’d themselves for fear,
 All the knights at Camelot :
 But Lancelot mused a little space ;
 He said, ‘ She has a lovely face ;
 God in his mercy lend her grace,
 The Lady of Shalott.’ ”

Shalott is a form of Astolat. The poem was suggested by an Italian romance—Donna di Scalotta, but modified in the later version to a closer resemblance with the story of Elaine.

ulation, the harmonies and cadences of The Lotos-Eaters,* in the finely drawn portraits of The Dream of Fair Women, and especially in the highly wrought beauty and deep moral significance of the allegory presented in The Palace of Art,† indisputable evidences of original genius were displayed. It was impossible to receive this body of poetry in contemptuous silence ; it was difficult to withhold from it a meed of respect. But the casquet which held these jewels contained some spurious and many faulty brilliants. And in the Quarterly of July, 1833, a full and cruel but, in many respects, admirable review of Tennyson's poetry proceeded with caustic irony "to point out," as the writer said, "the peculiar brilliancy of some of the gems that irradiate his poetical crown." The indignation of Tennyson-worshippers against the author of this critique has never slept, but in my judgment it may be justly claimed not only as the most effective, but in the poet's own interest the most valuable review ever written. The supreme excellence of Tennyson's poetry resides, if anywhere, in its flawless perfection of finish. Had Tennyson not been a great, almost a faultless artist, he would have been a poet of inconsiderable rank. He became such an artist by assiduous culture of rare native talent, and the criticism of the Quarterly showed the young author the indispensable necessity of the sternest artistic governance, the strictest self-discipline. Lockhart (doubtless the author) was a severe critic, but his severity bore fruit where extravagant praise or indulgent partiality would have proved less than barren.

† "As The Palace of Art represents the pride of voluptuous enjoyment in its noblest form, the St. Simeon Stylites represents the pride of asceticism at its basest.

Some of the pieces which drew forth his sarcastic comments were omitted from future editions, and almost all were altered or rewritten in respect of the censured passages.* The following poems were dropped in the next collected edition. Five Sonnets ("Mine be the strength of spirit fierce and free ;" "O Beauty, passing beauty ! sweetest sweet !" "Blow ye the trumpet, gather from afar ;" "How long, O God, shall men be ridden down ;" "As when with downcast eyes we muse and brood") ; Lines "To —†;" The Hesperides ; Rosalind ; Songs—Who can Say ; O Darling Room ; Lines "To Christopher North ;" Kate. In the first edition of The Palace of Art, many passages appeared which were struck out of all subsequent editions, and four stanzas descriptive of two statues in the palace were appended to the poem with a note, together with the following fine verses descriptive of a tower for astronomical observation :

" Hither, when all the deep unsounded skies
Were shuddering with silent stars, she clomb,
And, as with optic glasses, her keen eyes
Pierced through the mystic dome.

" Regions of lucid matter taking forms,
Brushes of fire, hazy gleams,
Clusters and beds of worlds, and bee-like swarms
Of suns and starry streams.

" She saw the snowy poles of moonless Mars,
That marvellous round of milky light
Below Orion, and those double stars
Whereof the one more bright

" Is circled by the other."

"In this poem," wrote Lockhart, "we first observed a stroke of art which we think very ingenious." No one who has ever written verses but must have felt the pain of erasing some happy line, some striking phrase, which, however excellent in itself, did not exactly suit the place for which it was destined. How curiously does an author mould and remould the plastic verse in order to fit in the favourite thought ; and when he finds that he cannot introduce it, as Corporal Trim says, anyhow, with what reluctance does he at last reject the intractable but still cherished offspring of his brain ! Mr. Tennyson manages this delicate matter in a new and better way. He says with great candour and simplicity, ‘ If this poem were not already too long, I should have added the following stanzas,’ and then he adds them ; or, ‘ I intended to have added something on statuary, but I found it very difficult ; but I have finished the statues of Elijah and Olympias ; judge whether I have succeeded ;’ and then we have those two statues. This is certainly the most ingenious device that has ever come under our observation for reconciling the rigour of criticism with the indulgence of parental partiality.” Another comment of Lockhart’s may be quoted. The early version of the Dream of Fair Women contained these lines in the description of Iphigenia’s sacrifice :

“ One drew a sharp knife through my slender throat ;
Slowly, and nothing more.”

“ What touching simplicity,” remarked the reviewer, “ what pathetic resignation—he cut my throat—‘nothing more !’ One might indeed ask what more she would have ?”*

* The lines now stand as follows—

“ The bright death quiver’d at the victim’s throat ;
Touch’d ; and I knew no more.”

In April, 1833, Coleridge, than whom no subtler musician in words has ever written verse, wrote of these early poems as follows : " I have not read through all Mr. Tennyson's poems, which have been sent to me, but I think there are some things of a good deal of beauty in that I have seen. The misfortune is that he has begun to write verses without very well understanding what metre is. Even if you write in a known and approved metre, the odds are, if you are not a metrist yourself, that you will not write harmonious verses ; but to deal in new metres without considering what metre means and requires is preposterous. What I would, with many wishes of success, prescribe to Tennyson—indeed without it he can never be a poet in art—is to write for the next two or three years in none but one or two well-known and strictly defined metres, such as the heroic couplet, the octave stanza, or the octosyllabic measure of the Allegro and Penseroso. He would probably thus get imbued with a sensation, if not a sense, of metre without knowing it, just as Eton boys get to write good Latin verses by conning Ovid and Tibullus. As it is, I can scarcely scan his verses."* How is this criticism of Coleridge's to be interpreted? To censure the author of The Lotos-Eaters, The Palace of Art, and Cenone as deficient in a knowledge of what metre was excites surprise, and were any other than Coleridge the critic, would excite derision no less. Yet Coleridge is in a sense right. Tennyson, more especially in his earlier poems, was a melodist rather than a metrist. He aimed at musical effects, at sound-effects only perfectible for the human ear through some more plastic medium than language. The human voice may be regarded as a perfect instrument of limited range, but as the organ of articulate speech it is at once ennobled and degraded—ennobled as the servant of the rational soul, degraded as a musical instrument. Languageless emotion it may adequately render, as the harp or violin render it; intellectual precision, only attainable in some articulate tongue, is incompatible with the freedom of its chords, essential for the production of the purely musical effects attainable through other mediums.*

For ten years after the publication of the 1832 poems Tennyson published no volume of verse. When at length he broke silence, it was to take assured rank among English poets. "If anything were to happen to Tennyson," said Elizabeth Barrett, "the world should go into mourning." The first of the two volumes published in 1842 was mainly composed of poems which had already appeared in the previous collected editions of 1830 and 1832, the second of poems, with one or two exceptions, entirely new. Of the reprinted pieces some were practically re-written and many were

* Edgar Allan Poe, writing in the New York Democratic Review (December, 1844), notices in Tennyson the absence of strict regard to metre. "His shorter pieces abound in minute rhythmical lapses—sufficient to assure me that, in common with all poets, living or dead, he has neglected to make precise investigation of the principles of metre; but, on the other hand, so perfect is his rhythmical instinct in general, that he seems to see with his ear." It were more correct, I believe, to say that he attempts to reproduce a melody correctly heard by the ear, but disorganized when set to words—that is, only imperfectly reproduced; hence the rhythmical lapses; hence, too, the inapplicability of ordinary metrical principles.

amended. The attempt to chronicle the alterations made by Tennyson in his poetry, even after it was made public, would in itself require a volume. It will suffice to remark that up to the last the successive editions invariably contained changes, many, indeed, slight or verbal, but no less indicative of the scrupulous and incessant attention bestowed upon his work. Take as one example these lines, the opening of Cenone in the 1832 volume :

“ There is a dale in Ida, lovelier
Than any in Ionia, beautiful
With emerald slopes of sunny sward, that lean
Above the loud glen river, which hath worn
A path thro’ steep-down* granite walls below
Mantled with flowering tendrill twine.”

This might have been written by any one, but in 1842 it had been through the refiner’s hands again, and emerged pure Tennysonian :

“ There is a vale in Ida, lovelier
Than all the valleys of Ionian hills.
The swimming vapour slopes athwart the glen,
Puts forth an arm, and creeps from pine to pine,
And lingers, slowly drawn. On either hand
The lawns and meadow-ledges midway down
Hang rich in flowers, and far below them roars
The long brook falling thro’ the clov’n ravine
In cataract after cataract to the sea.”

When Monckton Milnes, on behalf of Tennyson’s friends, represented to Sir Robert Peel, then Prime Minister, that the poet’s name be placed upon the civil list for a pension, he sent him a copy of these poems, marking Ulysses and Locksley Hall. * Of all his poems probably the latter has gained the widest appreciation. Its colour and picturesqueness, the freshness of its treatment of a simple and familiar theme, and the lively movement of its trochaic measure won for it instant popularity. In a copy of the first edition, originally possessed by Mr. R. W. Proctor, the following verses appear in manuscript after the nineteenth couplet :

“ In the hall there hangs a painting, Amy’s arms are round my neck,

Happy children in a sunbeam, sitting on the ribs of wreck.

“ In my life there is a picture : she that clasped my neck is flown,
I am left within the shadow, sitting on the wreck alone.”

These lines serve to connect this poem with the Locksley Hall of Sixty Years After, as they appear in the later poem after the sixth couplet. Several of the readings of the first edition have been changed, e.g. :

“ Let the peoples spin forever down the ringing grooves of change”
and

“ ’Tis the place, and round the gables, as of old, the curlews call.”

Among the new poems of this collection the Morte d’Arthur, the English idylls, Dora, and The Gardener’s Daughter,† The Two Voices, Ulysses,‡ and St. Simeon Stylites, are the most remarkable, and call for special notice as marking an advance in the scope and ethical

* “ The May Queen is all Lincolnshire inland, as Locksley Hall its sea-board.”

significance of the poet's art. When these poems were published Tennyson had passed the first two stages of his poetical career—the derivative period, during which he was in turn influenced by preceding writers, and imitated their several manners, and the period of musical effects, in which the formal part of poetry, its sensuous beauty, had occupied his ear and mind. Experience of real life—the death of his beloved friend, Arthur Hallam—awoke in him the fuller pulse of manhood. The ebb and flow of human passion, the deeper currents in the lives of men, were now the springs of a less sensuous, more intellectual music. In youth, it was the loveliness and the charm of the world that took by storm his imagination; in age, its majesty, its unriddled mysteries, and far-reaching issues are the burden of his song. In Ulysses the many voices of the ocean summon the wanderer from inglorious rest, and once again he calls together his friends for a voyage of heroic enterprise; in The Two Voices,* the old yet ever new debate on the value and the issues of our mortal life is evolved with a wonderful skill and a critical exactness which brings to mind the art of Dryden, that master logician in verse; in St. Simeon Stylites, the companion picture to Ulysses, the fruitlessness of the creed that in its passion for another world neglects the present is vividly pictured, and we have in it the most dramatically conceived and executed poem he had yet written. Tennyson's mind, as I have elsewhere attempted to show, was in fuller sympathy with the ethics and ideals of Greek philosophy than with the self-effacing spirit of the Middle Ages. In this poem we have his criticism in dramatic form of the extreme asceticism, the "other-worldliness" of mediæval Christianity, but it is a criticism full of sympathy. That he should have entered into its spirit, and exhibited the finer shades of feeling in a spiritual mood so foreign to his own gives to the poem an element of very special interest. It may be said that in The Idylls of the King—in some respects his most characteristic work—the mental attitude is distinctly Christian. But I should prefer to describe the symbolism of the idylls as neo-Platonic. The allegory of “the soul at war with sense,” though embodied in a chivalric romance, is pervaded by conceptions which have their root in the poetic mysticism of Plato’s many-sided mind. The philosophic creed of Browning and the devout faith of Mr. Aubrey de Vere, if their poetry be contrasted with Tennyson’s, have their roots deep struck in the soil of pure Christianity,* and borrow from the philosophers subsidiary conceptions only; with Tennyson, though his creed was indeed Christian, it was grafted on the tree of high pagan speculation.

* The measure had been employed by Ben Jonson.

In these 1842 volumes Tennyson speaks out of his heart and mind. He remained till the last a delicate manipulator of musical phrases, but the substance, or what Aristotle would call “the soul of the poem,” is no longer second to the diction, the body in which it resides.

Dora and The Gardener’s Daughter, like The Miller’s Daughter of the previous volume, are vignettes of real country life, idyllic scenes, “tasting of Flora and the country green.” It is the richness of colour, the lush luxuriance of beauty, not tropical, but through generations ordered by skilful hands—such colour and luxuriance as English landscape alone can show—that are lovingly dwelt upon in Tennyson's descriptive poetry. He was a patriot who loved his native country best—her citizens, her government, her traditions, and not less the flowers in her fields, the skies above them, and the sea that keeps her inviolate. It is instructive, however disillusionising, to note the extraordinary "interval" in the fine judgment of such an artist, which permitted these lines (afterwards suppressed), entitled The Skipping-Rope,* a place beside the truly great poems of 1842 :

" Sure never yet was antelope
 Could skip so lightly by.
 Stand off, or else my skipping-rope
 Will hit you in the eye.
 How lightly whirls the skipping-rope !
 How fairy-like you fly !
 Go, get you gone, you muse and mope -
 I hate that silly sigh.
 Nay, dearest, teach me how to hope.
 Or tell me how to die.
 There, take it, take my skipping-rope,
 And hang yourself thereby."

The future may discover in this some oracular meaning, but surely Fitzgerald was justified when he said :
 " Alfred, whatever he may think, cannot trifle. His smile is rather a grim one."†

CHAPTER III.

SINCE Shakespeare's day woman had not occupied in English poetry so large and gracious a space as in the character-studies of Tennyson's early volumes. The ideals of chivalry were come again, but enriched and refined.

In The Princess, published in 1847, the now widely-known poet became the poetic interpreter and critic of that movement of thought and feeling which concerned itself with the position of woman in the social organisation. In a fantastic and half serious, half sportive allegory, "moving as in a strange diagonal," he outlined and reduced to form the many elements in the problem, and by his statement, no less than by his solution of the questions involved, gave definite and concrete shape to the vague aspirations and somewhat nebulous ideas present in the intellectual atmosphere.

The Princess.
1847.

Criticise it as you will, and the early reviewers were not tardy in expressing disapproval, The Princess is a poem full of Tennyson's own peculiar charm. "A medley," as it was called, incongruous and unreal, if it betrays the poet's faults and weaknesses, it cannot be denied to possess many of his most winning and most characteristic excellences. Like most of his longer poems, it was built up to its present shape through successive editions. The second edition, published after a year's interval, contained few changes, and was dedicated to Henry Lushington,* an ardent admirer, with whom the author was on a visit in September, 1847, and whose friendship was one of the most prized in his life. With the third edition (1850) began the series of extensive emendations, omissions, and additions, which were continued in the fourth and fifth editions of 1851 and 1853. The hint for the story is by some believed to have been given in Johnson's Rasselas. "The princess thought, that of all sublunary things, knowledge was the best; she desired, first, to learn all sciences, and then proposed to found a college of learned women, in which she would preside, that, by conversing with the old and educating the young, she might divide her time between the acquisition and communication of wisdom, and raise up for the next age models of prudence and patterns of piety." It has been suggested by others that the inspiration came from Defoe or Margaret Cavendish's Female Academy. By others, again, the clue to the genesis of The Princess is found in the lines :

" This were a medley ! we should have him back
Who told the ' Winter's Tale ' to do it for us," and the central idea in the plot of Love's Labour's Lost, which turns upon a three years' enforced seclusion in study and apart from women:

" Our court shall be a little Academe,
Still and contemplative in living art."

The question is not a grave one and need not be definitely answered. The scene of the Prologue is laid in the south of England, and the surroundings may be those of Sir John Simcon's garden at Swainston. The host, in whose grounds the opening festival is held, is probably the poet's friend under the disguise of Sir Walter Vivian. Some lines (afterwards omitted) in the Epilogue, which was almost entirely rewritten for the third edition, give an account of the original design, and its subsequent development:

" Here closed our compound story, which at first
Had only meant to banter little maids
With mock heroics and with parody ;
But slipt in some strange way, crost with burlesque,
From mock to earnest, even into tones
Of tragic, and with less and less of jest
To such a serious end."

Besides remodelling the Prologue and Epilogue, and in many respects shaping the poem to a later design, Tennyson added to the third edition the exquisite songs, which alone secure for the work in which they are set an immortality of remembrance. It already contained that wonderful isometric lyric, Tears, Idle Tears, which I am inclined to regard as the most characteristic of his genius of any poem ever written by the author, and that for two reasons. It is his most successful expression of the emotion of vague regret, of dumb inarticulate pain of heart, a province of universal human feeling, which Tennyson alone among poets* has found a voice to render, and thus made peculiarly his own.

Here, as in the lines :

* If he have a rival in this province it is Goethe.

On thy cold gray stones, O Sea !”*

he has sounded the hidden and mysterious places of the soul, whence at times wells up a nameless and a causeless sorrow, and to its incommunicable speech the chords of his music vibrate. And of the music the form, too, is all his own. That the measure is the measure of Hamlet and the Paradise Lost is difficult to realise. The subtle sweetness of the modulation is typical of Tennyson's handling of our great national metre, and is displayed here in its fullest perfection. He discovered in it a lyric quality hitherto unsuspected, and if it be objected that the division into stanzas and the recurrence of the phrase “days that are no more” serves to compensate for the absence of rhyme, it is only necessary to turn to the “small sweet idyll,” “Come down, O maid, from yonder mountain height,”† where without stanza or definite rhyme the effect of lyric movement is perfectly attained. In the concluding lines of the last-named poem there is much onomatopœic beauty :‡

“ Myriads of rivulets hurrying through the lawn,
The moan of doves in immemorial elms,
And murmuring of innumerable bees.”

† Written during an Alpine tour in 1846.

‡ “Onomatopœic effects are common in Tennyson, as in such a passage as this :

“ *Plunged : and the flood drew ; yet I caught her ; then Oaring one arm, and bearing in my left
The weight of all the hopes of half the world,
Strove to buffet to land in vain.*”

—The Princess.

"Who after three such lines," wrote Charles Kingsley, "will talk of English as a harsh and clumsy language, and seek in the effeminate and monotonous Italian for expressive melody of sound? Who cannot hear in them the rapid rippling of the water, the stately calmness of the wood-dove's note, and in the repetition of short syllables and soft liquids in the last line : *

"The murmuring of innumerable bees"?

I may here note, in passing, possible suggestions for one or two of the songs. For the third † Moore's lyric, How Sweet the Answer Echo Makes, and for the fifth the tenth section of Canto I. of Scott's Lay, and the Anglo-Saxon fragment, Gudrun.

To the fourth edition of The Princess were added the passages relating to the "weird seizures" of the Prince, and a few minor alterations were introduced into the text; the fifth contained for the first time the

Or here, where the sound of the violin is imitated in the "n's and "u's.

"All night have the roses heard

The flute, violin, bassoon :

All night has the casement jessamine stirred

To the dancers dancing in tune."

—Maud.

* Of this idyll Symonds writes in his Studies of the Greek Poets : "It transfers with perfect taste the Greek idyllic feeling to Swiss scenery; it is a fine instance of new wine being successfully poured into old bottles, for nothing could be fresher, and not even the Thalysia is sweeter." But Mr. Symonds is wrong when he speaks of it (Appendix) as containing "no reiterated sounds." Let any one read the first half-dozen lines and judge for himself. The place of rhymed endings is taken by interlaced repetitions of the same words and phrases. The rhyming may not be regular, but the poem is full of rhymes.

fifteen lines in the Prologue, beginning "O miracle of women." Among the many omissions which were made between the successive issues one possesses an interest which make it perhaps worthy of record. It occurs in the speech of the Princess in answer to Lady Blanche.

" But Ida with a voice, that like a bell
 Toll'd by an earthquake in a trembling tower,
 Rang ruin, answered full of grief and scorn
*What ! in our time of glory when the cause
 Now stands up, first, a trophied pillar—now
 So clipt, so stinted in our triumph—barred
 Ev'n from our free heart—thanks, and every way
 Thwarted and vexed, and lastly catechised
 By our own creature ! one that made our laws !
 Our great she—Solon ! her that built the nest
 To hatch the cuckoo ! whom we called our friend !
 But we will crush the lie that glances at us
 As cloaking in the larger charities
 Some baby predilection : all amazed !
 We must amaze this legislator more.'*

[Here follow eight retained lines.]

" *Go help the half-brained dwarf Society,
 To find low motives unto noble deeds,
 To fix all doubt upon the darker side ;
 Go, fitter there for narrowest neighbourhoods,
 Old talker, haunt where gossip breeds and seethes,
 And festers in provincial sloth ! and you,
 That think we sought to practise on a life
 Risk'd for our own and trusted to our hands.
 What say you, sir ? you hear us ; deem ye not
 'Tis all too like that even now we scheme,
 In one broad death confounding friend and foe,
 To drug them all ? revolve it ; you are man,
 And therefore no doubt wise."*

Both the poem and the character of the Princess have gained much by the rejection of these weak and tasteless lines.

The pause that occurs at the close of the fourth canto when Lilia sings :

“Thy voice is heard thro’ rolling drums,” marks the “change in the music,” the transition from gay to grave, the point at which the “enchanted reverie” passes into the serious allegory. It will be noticed that the songs at once reflect and focus the significant or uppermost sentiment of the cantos they separate and unite, and may be read as a clue to the poet’s philosophy of the relations between the sexes. Around the child gather all the elements in the social problem, and in so far as Tennyson offers any solution of that problem it is by emphasising the laws of nature which determine in their inexorable fashion the place of the man and the place of the woman in any social system that is to endure. To say that

“Woman is not undevelop’d man
But diverse ; could we make her as the man,
Sweet Love were slain ;”

to say that they must

“Sit side by side, full-summ’d in all their powers, Dispensing harvest, sowing the To-be”—

this is but to give poetic expression to very evident things, but it is also to give expression to the only “thinkable” philosophy of the matter. Tennyson has added nothing to our knowledge, but he has beautifully summed for us, as an artist should, the teaching of nature, our mother.

In many respects the distinctive elements in Tennyson’s poetic genius—certainly those of his youthful genius—the branches of his art in which he excelled are most prominently exhibited and may be most advantageously studied in this poem. The idyll was a form borrowed indeed from the Greek, but, suited as it was to his powers, the form which he made especially his own. And The Princess is an idyll or series of idyllic pictures where the sweetness of his versification, his subtle skill in word-painting, and his keen and yet gracious vein of pleasantry meet under the felicitous auspices of a subject eminently appropriate to their display.

The Laureate's model in blank verse was Milton, and his verse displays the artist's reverence for a greater artist. Compared with Milton's, his blank verse is distinguished by the much larger proportion it contains of words of pure English stock, by the comparative frequency with which the pause comes at the end of the line and by his preference for the internal pause after the fourth syllable to that after the sixth, which was Milton's favourite. The splendour of the great wheeling circles of Milton's verse, its organ-like harmony, the billowy mounting volume of its music, is in large measure due to its periodic structure. Milton constructed his verse in paragraphs, caring more for the effect of the whole than of its constituent parts, and so arranging the pause and cadence of his single lines that the ear remains attent until the final strain is reached, in which the suggested harmonies are all resolved, each paragraph

“ swelling loudly

Up to its climax, and then dying proudly.”

With Tennyson the single line is more frequently sufficient for itself, the periodic system less conspicuous. The traditional licences, elision such as is exhibited here :

“ O swallow, swallow, if I could follow and light
Upon her lattice, I would pipe and trill”—

an occasional initial trochee, or in the second or fourth foot, in room of the iambus, and feminine endings, are to be found in Tennyson, as in most other writers, but he is more uniformly careful to avoid abruptness or harshness ; so much so, that his verse exhibits a more evenly polished surface than that of any other English poet. Among musical devices, alliteration ranks as his first favourite, and is used throughout his poetry with unusually fine effect and with less insistence than by Mr. Swinburne, whose monotony in this respect is not infrequently exasperating. Tennyson's alliteration, skilfully introduced in its unapparent form when the similarity of sound occurs in the body rather than in the initial letters of words, as, for example :

“ A life that leads melodious days,”

accounts for much of his melodic beauty. His poverty in rhymes, a point in which he offers a striking contrast to Browning, who is royal in affluence, is particularly noticeable in his longest rhymed poem, In Memoriam ;* a poverty compensated by studied and ingenious arrangement of alliterative phrases, as once more, for example :

“ Wild bird whose warble liquid sweet.”

Instances may be found, I believe, in every section of this poem. A critical and scientific workman in his measures, Tennyson might have been trusted to write upon any subject at any length without fear of descent into the slipshod or turgid movement of Wordsworth's lengthy disquisitions.

The word-painting of The Princess, no less than its versification, will reward a careful study. It seems that the author was in the habit of noting a scene or aspect of nature in a few brief phrases, as a painter might with a dash or two of colour suggest a scheme for future elaboration. Here is the result where the memory of an approaching storm, seen from the brow of Snowdon, supplied the original suggestion :

“ As one that climbs a peak to gaze
O'er land and main, and sees a great black cloud
Drag inward from the deeps, a wall of night,
Blot out the slope of sea from verge to shore,
And suck the blinding splendour from the sand,
And quenching lake by lake and tarn by tarn

I am unacquainted with any poem exhibiting a more luxuriant richness of colour or more vivid and delicate picturesqueness of imagery. Illustration is needless, but take this :

“ Many a little hand
Glanced like a touch of sunshine on the rocks,
Many a light foot shone like a jewel set
In the dark crag.”

In its entirety, The Princess, though not his most ambitious work, displays, as I have already indicated, the qualities of Tennyson's genius which the future will speak of as “Tennysonian,” as exclusively his own, the qualities which of all English poets he possessed and cultivated in the fullest measure. It is the highest conceivable reach in decorative art, nor can lyrical sweetness be further sweetened. Half classic, half mediæval in feeling, wholly modern in subject and treatment, it represents the character of the author's mind. His culture enabled him to embellish and enrich with a wealth of suggestion and illustration so fresh a theme as the emancipation of woman, in a style of captivating, dream-like phantasy, and, as in The Idylls of the King, the strongest elements in his nature, mysticism and romance, are subtly woven through the whole.

The following letter, the most important and interesting ever written by Tennyson in connexion with his poetry, was addressed to Mr. S. E. Dawson, author of A Study of "The Princess." It naturally claims a place here :

"ALDWORTH, HASLEMERE, SURREY,

November 21, 1882.

"DEAR SIR : I thank you for your able and thoughtful essay on The Princess. You have seen, among other things, that if women ever were to play such freaks, the tragic and the burlesque might go hand in hand. I may tell you that the songs were not an afterthought. Before the first edition came out I deliberated with myself whether I should put songs in between the separate divisions of the poem ; again, I thought, the poem will explain itself ; but the public did not see that the child, as you say, was the heroine of the piece, and at last I conquered my laziness and inserted them. You would be still more certain that the child was the true heroine, if instead of the first song as it now stands,

" ' As thro' the land at eve we went,'

I had printed the first song which I wrote, The Losing

of the Child. The child is sitting on the bank of the river, and playing with flowers ; a flood comes down ; a dam has been broken through ; the child is borne down by the flood ; the whole village distracted ; after a time the flood has subsided ; the child is thrown safe and sound again upon the bank, and all the women are in raptures. I quite forget the words of the ballad, but I think I may have it somewhere.

“Your explanatory notes are very much to the purpose, and I do not object to your finding parallelisms. They must always recur. A man (a Chinese scholar) some time ago wrote to me, saying that in an unknown, untranslated Chinese poem there were two whole lines of mine almost word for word. Why not? Are not human eyes all over the world looking at the same objects, and must there not consequently be coincidences of thought and impressions and expressions? It is scarcely possible for any one to say or write anything in this late time of the world to which in the rest of the literature of the world a parallel could not somewhere be found. But when you say that this passage or that was suggested by Wordsworth or Shelley or another, I demur, and, more, I wholly disagree. There was a period in my life when, as an artist—Turner, for instance—takes rough sketches of language, etc., in order to work them eventually into some great picture ; so I was in the habit of chronicling, in four or five words or more, whatever might strike me as picturesque in nature. I never put these down, and many and many a line has gone away on the north wind, but some remain—e.g. :

“ ‘ A full sea glazed with muffled moonlight.’

“Suggestion : The sea one night at Torquay, when Torquay was the most lovely sea village in England, though now a smoky town ; the sky was covered with thin vapour, and the moon was behind it.

“ ‘ A great black cloud
Drags inward from the deep.’

“ Suggestion : A coming storm seen from the top of Snowdon. In the Idylls of the King :

“ ‘ With all
Its stormy crests that smoke against the skies.’

“ Suggestion : A storm that came upon us in the middle of the North Sea.

“ ‘ As the water-lily starts and slides.’

“ Suggestion : Water-lilies in my own pond, seen in a gusty day with my own eyes. They did start and slide in the sudden puffs of wind till caught and stayed by the tether of their own stalks—quite as true as Wordsworth’s simile, and more in detail.

“ ‘ A wild wind shook—
Follow, follow, thou shalt win.’

“ Suggestion : I was walking in the New Forest. A wind did arise, and :

“ ‘ Shake the songs, the whispers and the shrieks
Of the wild wood together.’

“ The wind, I believe, was a west wind, but because I wished the Prince to go south, I turned the wind to the south, and naturally the wind said, ‘ Follow.’

“ I believe the resemblance which you note is just a chance one. Shelley’s lines are not familiar to me, though, of course, if they occur in The Prometheus I must have read them.

“ I could multiply instances, but I will not bore you ; and far indeed am I from asserting that books, as well as nature, are not and ought not to be suggestive to the poet. I am sure that I myself and many others find a peculiar charm in those passages of such great masters as Virgil or Milton where they adopt the creation of a bygone poet, and reclothe it, more or less, according to their own fancy.

"But there is, I fear, a prosaic set growing up among us, editors of booklets, bookworms, index-hunters, or men of great memories and no imagination, who impute themselves to the poet, and so believe that he, too, has no imagination, but is forever poking his nose between the pages of some old volume in order to see what he can appropriate. They will not allow one to say, 'Ring the bells' without finding that we have taken it from Sir P. Sydney, or even to use such a simple expression as the ocean 'roars' without finding out the precise verse in Homer or Horace from which we have plagiarised it. (Fact!)

"I have known an old fishwife who had lost two sons at sea clench her fist at the advancing tide on a stormy day and cry out: 'Ay, roar; do! How I hates to see thee show thy white teeth!' Now, if I had adopted her exclamation, and put it into the mouth of some old woman in one of my poems, I dare say the critic would have thought it original enough, but would most likely have advised me to go to nature for my old woman, and not to my imagination; and, indeed, it is a strong figure. Here is another little anecdote about suggestion. When I was about twenty or twenty-one I went on a tour to the Pyrenees. Lying among these mountains before a waterfall that comes down one thousand or twelve hundred feet, I sketched it (according to my custom then) in these words:

“ ‘Slow-dropping veils of thinnest lawn.’

When I printed this a critic informed me that ‘lawn’ was the material used in theatres to imitate a waterfall, and graciously added : ‘Mr. T. should not go to the boards of a theatre, but to nature herself, for his suggestions.’ And I had gone to nature herself. I think it is a moot point whether, if I had known how that effect was produced on the stage, I should have ventured to publish the line. I beg you to believe me, etc.,
A. TENNYSON.”

“ P. S.—By the by, you are wrong about ‘the tremulous isles of light ;’ they are isles of light, spots of sunshine coming through the eaves, and seeming to slide from one to the other, as the procession of girls ‘move under the shade.’ And surely the ‘beard-blown goat’ involves a sense of the wind blowing the beard on the height of the ruined pillar.”

CHAPTER IV.

ARTHUR HENRY HALLAM, Tennyson's college friend and constant companion, died in September, 1833. From their first meeting until the companionship was broken by death not quite five years elapsed,* and almost seventeen years passed away before In Memoriam, the elegy which has become the imperishable monument of their friendship was given to the world.† The poems composing it were written at intervals during Tennyson's life in London, and the whole was complete or almost complete long prior to its publication. "A. T. has near a volume of poems—elegiac—in memory of Arthur Hallam," wrote Fitzgerald in January, 1845; "don't you think the world wants other notes than elegiac now? Lycidas is the utmost length an elegiac should reach. But Spedding praises; and I suppose the elegiacs will see daylight, public daylight, one day." When the elegiacs did see daylight, five years later, they were published anonymously, but Tennyson's name upon the title-page was not necessary to proclaim him the author.

* In Memoriam, xxii.

† An interesting circumstance connects Hallam with another great English elegy, Adonais. It was first printed in Pisa, under the direction of Byron, and a copy of the pamphlet was brought by Hallam from Italy. The poem appeared for the first time in an English edition, accessible to English readers, in The Transactions of the Cambridge Union, 1834.

The attention of a reader of In Memoriam is at the outset naturally directed to the form of the stanza, which is unvaried throughout. The arrangement of the transposed quatrain has much to do with the effect produced by the poem as a whole and in its several parts ; it strikes the key-note of the elegiac mood, and thus preserves throughout sections that deal with very varying subject-matter the unity of sentiment which binds them together ; and when the poet is dealing with the philosophical problems that naturally suggest themselves in such a poem, the thought flows with less interruption into the mould of this than it could conceivably have done into any other rhymed form among English measures. I have no doubt that the possibilities in the stanza for reflective elegiac poetry were suggested to Tennyson by the short elegy composed in the same metre by Ben Jonson.* Might one not accept this, for example, as part of the later poem ?

“ Who, as an offering at your shrine,
Have sung this hymn, and here entreat
One spark of your diviner heat
To light upon a love of mine.”

The same measure was employed by Lord Herbert, of Cherbury,† in a short love poem of small merit but more interest, as containing verses such as these, which so nearly recall the later music :

“ O no, belov'd ! I am most sure
Those virtuous habits we acquire,
As being with the soul entire,
Must with it evermore endure.

* Ben Jonson's Underwoods. The suggestion was probably unconscious.

† Born 1581. Died 1648. Elder brother of George Herbert.

“ Else should our souls in vain elect ;
And vainer yet were heaven's laws,
When to an everlasting cause
They gave a perishing effect.

“ These eyes again thine eyes shall see,
And hands again these hands infold ;
And all chaste pleasures can be told,
Shall with us everlasting be.”*

I am not sure that Tennyson has anywhere invented a new poetic form ; but here, as throughout his poetry, he proves his possession of that singular penetration of judgment which made choice with perfect instinct of the formal mould best suited to his theme. As will be seen, I incline to regard the pre-eminent quality in his genius as keen-sighted judgment rather than power of initiative or originating way of thought. The original thinker is original in the disengagement of his mental processes from the grooves in which the thoughts of ordinary men run, and in his presentation of the facts with which all are familiar in new and unexpected relationships. Tennyson—and no better example of my meaning need be adduced than this poem—is a great and deservedly popular poet because his way of thought is that of the cultivated minds of his time ; and his large and indisputable influence in the shaping of the ideas of that time is in great degree due to the ripeness of the popular mind to receive those ideas, and to the fact that his precision and beauty of expression made clear to his readers what they had already themselves obscurely felt and thought. Does any one ask : “Is this not to be a great poet, a poet of the first order?” I would answer, “It is to be a great poet, but not a poet of the first order, for it recalls the greatness of Pope and of Gray, it suggests no companionship with Dante, with Milton, or with Wordsworth." It may, perhaps, again be asked : "Is not Virgil a poet of the first order, and is not Tennyson comparable to Virgil?" To me it seems that fortunate as Tennyson was in the hour of his birth, he lacked a supreme poetic lot such as fell to Virgil—still, in Bacon's words, "The chastest poet and the royalest that to the memory of man is known"—to be the acknowledged poetic representative of Rome's imperial race, to have for theme, majestic and incomparable, the foundation and the glories of Rome itself.

Published when the century had reached its middle year, In Memoriam best reflects of any poem written during the century the current moods of its thought and feeling. Here are put into verse the problems of the head and heart that were uppermost in men's minds in the days in which he wrote, so that the poet, while he speaks of his personal sorrow, is really a man of his time, speaking for his contemporaries. For this reason In Memoriam is an elegy in a class by itself, nor can it, to any purpose, be compared with poems like Lycidas or Adonais. Each of these is a dirge, in which the person of the lost friend is never lost sight of, whereas the later elegy is a series of lyrics, many of which are general reflections in the presence of death the thought-compeller, rather than songs of mourning for a definite grief.* And, moreover, because it mirrors the life of the mind and heart in the valley of the shadow, its appeal is to emotions that are universal and thoughts that visit the homes of all the world. While, then, an expression of personal loss, and modern in its theological and philosophical features, In Memoriam is most purely human* in its interest of all elegiac poems that ever were written. Like Gray's elegy, in this predominance of the human element over the personal it takes a place in the hearts of its readers that the marvellous art and witchery of colour in Lycidas and Adonais can never give them.

* "It is rather the cry of the whole human race than mine. In the poem altogether private grief swells out into thought of and hope for the whole world. It begins with a funeral and ends with a marriage, begins with death and ends in promise of a new life—a sort of Divine Comedy, cheerful at the close. It is a very im-

In the history of theology In Memoriam marks the beginnings of that school of thought represented within the Church by Frederick Denison Maurice—the Broad Church movement, as it is called, which was itself the outcome of the more liberal and deeper view of life, its meaning and its issues, presented in the Transcendental philosophy. But while the influences of Kant and the later German thinkers, radiated in England by Coleridge and Carlyle, are abundantly apparent in Tennyson's philosophy, fairly summed in this poem, we must be careful to abstain from any effort to find in the poetic statement of his thought any definite scheme or system. If I were asked to give some succinct statement of Tennyson's philosophy, I should say that he emphasises in every line of his reflective poetry the creed of the higher emotions. Born as he was into a critical epoch, he personal poem, as well as personal. There is more about myself in Ulysses, which was written under the sense of loss and all that had gone by, but that still life must be fought out to the end. It was more written with the feeling of his loss upon me than many poems in In Memoriam."—"Remarks of Tennyson," quoted by the editor in the Nineteenth Century, January, 1893.

* It was sometimes called by the author The Way of the Soul.

could not but feel the uncertainties that mar, the doubt that threatens the most firmly built and most zealously guarded dogmas. Yet Tennyson's strength as a thinker seems to me to have lain in the sceptical attitude of his mind, not indeed towards the older forms of faith, but towards the newer creeds of science, which in the first flush of their youth claimed an easy victory, ere the ground upon which the battle was to be fought lay clearly mapped or determined before men's eyes. In his refusal to accept the negatives of science—a refusal more than justified even before his own death—in his conviction that the uncertainties of the new teaching were more uncertain, the doubts as to the reality of its solutions of the old problems to be doubted more gravely than those attaching to revelation, in this the penetration of his judgment was eminently proved. It is this grasp of real amid innumerable false issues, this intellectual sanity, which dignifies Tennyson as a thinker no less than a poet. If he lacked the power of imaginative synthesis, which in a brain like Plato's marshals the facts of the world under the unity of a self-consistent system, his analytic faculty probed deep and far.

I have said that briefly summed Tennyson's creed may be described as the creed of the higher emotions. The powerlessness of the human mind face to face with the tremendous problems of "why? whence? whither?" its inherent incapacity to solve these questions, was forced upon him, as it was forced upon his contemporaries, Clough and Arnold. But while with them in this, he did not share their spiritual dejection or sad stoic acquiescence in an unavoidable lot. Falling back upon a testimony higher than any that could be submitted to a critical scientific examination, he took up his position in the ancient and impregnable fortress of the soul that refuses to doubt its Divine origin, its home in God.

“ If e’er, when faith had fallen asleep,
I heard a voice, ‘ Believe no more,’
And heard an ever-breaking shore
That tumbled in the Godless deep;

“ A warmth within the breast would melt
The freezing reason’s colder part,
And like a man in wrath the heart
Stood up and answer’d, ‘ I have felt.’ ”*

This creed, based upon the higher emotions, or, as we may perhaps call it, the evidence of the best and noblest moments of the spirit’s inner life, is the spiritual message borne to his youthful friend by the Ancient Sage:

“ For nothing worthy proving can be proven,
Nor yet disproven ; wherefore thou be wise,
Cleave ever to the sunnier side of doubt,
And cling to faith beyond the forms of faith.”

The history of the soul in grief, such a grief, with its accompanying cloud of torturing doubts, as Death, the parter of friends, alone can bring, is in this poem delineated with a fidelity we dare not challenge. Its passage from affection for an earthly to devotion towards a heavenly friend, from vague doubt to hopeful trust, from “ wild unrest ” to peace, is strikingly matched in the history of the soul in Carlyle’s Sartor Resartus. From “ the everlasting no ” until the “ centre of indifference ” is passed the shadow lies deep upon the path, and then slowly “ a full new life ” is breathed, drawn in part from the subtle helpfulness of Nature in her time of spring,* until "the everlasting yea" is realised. In Memoriam has been compared with the sonnet-sequence of Shakespeare, and the comparison is not without interest. Many of Tennyson's phrases were borrowed from these sonnets; in both series of poems the deepest feelings and convictions of the heart and mind are reflected, and in both the labour of the artist strangely mingles a pleasure with its pain.

* In Memoriam, cxxiv.

While it outlines no system of thought, no philosophy of consolation, In Memoriam is pre-eminently a poem strong in soothing influences, in assuaging remedies for the pain of loss. It can hardly be said that Tennyson fortifies the mind and heart as Browning or as Wordsworth fortifies them. He supports and consoles, indeed, in that the reader is taken into his confidence, and learns what were the supports and consolations of the poet in his dark hour. Thus by sympathy with the sorrow he is drawn insensibly to sympathy with hope renewed and faith regained. In the presentment of his own experience, in that series of delicate sketches of the healing influences of time and nature allied against victorious despair Tennyson speaks to every mourner an unforgettable word.

Here, perhaps, may be fitly noticed the art displayed by Tennyson in making Nature sympathise with his varying moods. He finds in her an echo of his own secret feeling, and her sights and sounds minister to his heart.

"Calm is the morn without a sound,
Calm as to suit a calmer grief,
And only thro' the faded leaf
The chestnut pattering to the ground."

* In Memoriam, lxxxvi.

The lucid beauty and completeness of the scenes depicted in his earlier poems, in themselves delightful, prepare in each case the mind for the mood or sentiment that prevails throughout the story. In The Lotos-Eaters, for example, or in such idyllic scenes as are drawn in poems like The Miller's Daughter, Nature is in perfect harmony with the prevailing emotion, at once intensifying and interpreting it. Much of the charm resident in Tennyson's setting of tales, themselves destitute of any special interest, may be directly traced to the exquisite appropriateness of the background chosen and the no less exquisite skill in its portrayal.

A careful study of In Memoriam reveals more of design than is at first apparent in the arrangement of the lyrics.* Probably because it was long mature, before it was given to the world, the changes in later editions, if we except verbal alterations, are fewer than is the case with most of Tennyson's longer poems.† Two sections only were added : xxxix. ("Old warder of these buried bones") in the pocket volume edition, and lix. ("O Sorrow, wilt thou live with me?") in the fourth edition of 1851. The design, therefore, was complete from the first, and the sequence of sections has not been interfered with. It seems clear that Nos. i.-lvi. (now lvii. by reason of the interpolated "yew tree" section) were complete in themselves and were written, most of them, in the first year. No.

* Tennyson is quoted by Mr. Knowles (Nineteenth Century, January, 1893) as saying that there are "nine natural groups" of stanzas in the poem. These are : 1-8 ; 9-20 ; 20-27 ; 28-49 ; 50-58 ; 59-72 ; 72-98 ; 99-103 ; 104-131.

† Few for Tennyson ; about fifty verbal and other changes were made since its publication.

lvi. (lvii.) has a marked conclusion, and lvii. (lviii.) is introductory to a supplement. That supplement began with "He past, a soul of nobler tone," to which he afterwards prefixed lix. It is to be observed that he himself makes lix. begin the sixth of his nine groups. These five groups might be called Death, Burial, the Past, Christmas Hopes, the Future. The lapse of time is clearly marked ; the three Christmas seasons following the death of Hallam, in September, 1833, are each the subject of a section or sections,* and the whole is therefore a mental history of the years of the poet's life immediately following 1833. The Epilogue is a marriage greeting to Cecilia Tennyson, who, in October, 1842, was married to Edmund Law Lushington.

One more word may be added. I note in this poem a purity of colour in its pictorial passages, a quieter music than is elsewhere to be found in Tennyson's poetry. To one who takes up a volume of his verse after a volume by, let us say, a contemporary—Matthew Arnold—the colour seems glaring, and at times the music almost importunate. Arnold's ideal in the poetic art was a chastened simplicity, a reliance for effect in a poem, to use his own phrase concerning Wordsworth, solely on the weight and force of that which with entire fidelity it utters. Tennyson's decorative art, his love of colour for its own sake, of music for its own sake, lead him at times into what must always seem to the highly cultivated sense extravagances of colour, an over-profusion, a lush luxuriance, and into similar extravagances of sound. To put it briefly, he rarely trusts his thought, as Wordsworth

* xxviii.—xxx. ; lxxviii ; civ.—cv.

trusted it, to build for itself a natural home of expression. So much an artist was he that Nature could not speak his language, and hence the inevitable word is rarely heard in his poetry. Compare a poem like that entitled Palladium, or a poem like that To Marguerite, beginning :

“ Yes, in the sea of life enisled”—

compare these with almost any poems by Tennyson, and it will be seen that in the one case the power and charm of the verse belong in the main to the idea, in the other case are almost wholly dependent upon the language in which it is clothed.

Save in In Memoriam and in some of the finer passages of the Idylls, I do not know that elsewhere in Tennyson's more ambitious poetry is the decorative instinct, the laying of colour for the sake of colour, so restrained, the reliance upon the emotion or the idea so complete, the expression so simply and directly natural, as in the above and in a hundred other poems by Wordsworth or Arnold. If I am right, therefore, a purer ideal of art, a more fastidious taste guides the artist's hand in this than in any other part of his work :

“ Till now the doubtful dusk reveal'd
 The knoll once more where, couch'd at ease,
 The white kine glimmer'd, and the trees
 Laid their dark arms about the field ;

“ And, suck'd from out the distant gloom,
 A breeze began to tremble o'er
 The large leaves of the sycamore,
 And fluctuate all the still perfume,

“ And gathering freshlier overhead,
 Rock'd the full-foliaged elms, and swung
 The heavy-folded rose, and flung
 The lilies to and fro, and said,

“ ‘ The dawn, the dawn,’ and died away ;
 And East and West, without a breath,
 Mixt their dim lights, like life and death,
 To broaden into boundless day.”

Had he been content at all times to trust his subject as he has trusted it here, Tennyson would not only have been a greater poet, he would have been even a greater artist than he was, for the greatest artists are those who allow Nature to write in their names, and are themselves too wise to interfere with or add a word to the language she speaks.

It seems a far journey from the philosophy of In Memoriam to the philosophy of Maud,* from the poetry of a sad resignation to that of revolt ; yet there is little difficulty in recognizing the same hand in both, the same worker in different moods. As has been already observed, the germ from which Maud was developed is the lyric, Maud and “O, that ’twere possible,” contributed in Other Poems. 1837 to The Tribute, a collection of miscellaneous unpublished poems by various authors, published by John Murray, and edited by Lord Northampton. Among the other contributors were Wordsworth, Landor, Aubrey de Vere, Henry Taylor, Southey, Monckton Milnes, and Charles Tennyson. The proceeds from the sale of this publication were intended to relieve the necessities of the Rev. Edward Smedley, a clergyman in ill health and threatened with loss of eyesight. Smedley died before the book appeared, and the proceeds were given to his family. In reply to Milnes’ application to him for a contribution, Tennyson wrote : “ Three summers back, provoked by the incivility of editors, I swore an oath that I would never again have to do with their vapid books, and I broke it in the sweet face of Heaven when I wrote for Lady What's-her-name Wortley. But then her sister wrote to Brookfield, and said she (Lady W.) was beautiful; so I could not help it. But whether the Marquis be beautiful or not, I don't much mind; if he be, let him give God thanks, and make no boast. To write for people with prefixes to their names is to milk he-goats; there is neither honour nor profit." This characteristic effusion evoked an indignant remonstrance from Milnes, to whom Tennyson again wrote: "What has so jaundiced your good-natured eyes as to mistake harmless banter for insolent irony?" and promised his help. The promise was fulfilled by the contribution above mentioned. These stanzas developed into the lyrical drama, to which Tennyson's own remark may be applied—"Poetry is like shot silk with many glancing colours. Every reader must find his own interpretation according to his ability and according to his sympathy with the poet." The edition of 1855 gave the poem as continuous; the edition of the following year contained some new passages. In subsequent issues the poem was divided into two, and eventually into three parts, and styled "a monodrama."

Maud was greeted with an almost unanimous chorus of disapproval. Readers, critical and uncritical alike, complained that it was unreal, fantastic, had "the serious defect of leaving one in a painful state of confusion as to the limits of the sane and the insane;"* the chief charge of all being that it was an indefensible defence of war. As a psychological study of a difficult subject, it was natural that Maud should be misunderstood and unappreciated. The critical judgments are not now arrayed against the author's favourite work as they were at first, but it still remains and will remain the least favoured by his readers. In many respects it must, I think, be regarded as the most dramatic of Tennyson's poems, dramatic as the presentation not of the characters of a group of individuals and their mutual interaction, but as reflecting the varying moods of a single person of eager temper wrought upon by violent passions in a period itself full of exciting actions, of nerve-stirring emotions and of arousing ideas.* Maud is a lyrical monodrama, and into the lyrics which compose it Tennyson poured much of his strongest feeling, many of the thoughts which came from the closest corner of his brain. It is a sincere, a characteristic utterance, a real transcript of the poet's mind ; hence his love for it,† hence, too, its interest to students of his poetry. Whatever regard Tennyson in his poetry paid to the conventions—and as an artist he was to some extent their prisoner—he is here moving with a freer, more natural step, speaking to please himself, and himself alone. The subject, too, is a favourite one. Maud may fairly be

* To this it might be replied that the same charge may be brought against Hamlet, and that in nature no defining line can be drawn.

* Mr. Knowles quotes Tennyson as saying: "It should be called Maud, or The Madness. It is slightly akin to Hamlet. No other poem (a monotone with plenty of change and no weariness) has been made into a drama where successive phases of passion in one person take the place of successive persons. The whole of the stanzas where he is mad in Bedlam, from "Dead, long dead" to "Deeper, ever so little deeper," were written in twenty minutes, and some mad doctor wrote to me that nothing since Shakespeare has been so good for madness as this."—Nineteenth Century, January, 1893.

compared with the two Locksley Halls,* the poems of his youth and age that came most directly from the heart, taking them as a single work for the purpose of the comparison. In both the undercurrent of his nature becomes for the time the uppercurrent. Each is the story of a lost love ; in both there are noble aspirations, disappointed hopes, a touch of scorn, the outcome of such unfulfilled longing. The hero of each suffers the same sharp reverse, both would mix with action to keep at bay the tiger despair, both are critics of life, who find it an unweeded garden ; in both the vein of bitterness gives place to more self-honouring resolve.

“ Follow light and do the right, for man can half control his doom, Till you find the deathless angel seated in the vacant tomb,”

is a counsel at one with the resolve of the hero of Maud,

“ It is better to fight for the good than to rail at the ill.
I have felt with my native land, I am one with my kind,
I embrace the purpose of God and the doom assigned.”

For the rest, Maud passes now and then from the sphere of poetry into that of rhetoric, but in the best of the lyrics there is much of Tennyson's best, the imperishable beauty that belongs to the musical expression of sincere emotion. For a defence of the battle-ardour of Maud, we may read the Epilogue to The Charge of the Heavy Brigade. But a defence is unnecessary. Only the purblind moralist who knows nothing of life can fail to recognise that terrible as are its accompaniments of suffering and horror, by war are evoked the noblest elements of human character as well as its most debasing ; that in the furnace of its fires men are tried as gold in the refining pot, and that not seldom has it discovered beauties and heroisms, an unselfishness and devotion, the existence of which in self-seeking times of peace the most subtle observer could not even have suspected.

Maud is not a world-poem ; it is not even a poem of great imaginative range or far-reaching power, but it finds the vulnerable points in modern civilisation, and has its place with those true works of art which will not leave us at rest with ourselves until we know our minds and sound the real depth of our feelings.

In addition to Maud, this volume of 154 pages contained The Charge of the Light Brigade, Will, The Daisy, Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington, Lines to the Rev. F. D. Maurice,* The Brook, and the Letters.

Of the remaining poems few words are called for here. The Brook takes its rightful place among the English idylls, a vignette of English country life, peaceful and sweet. The Daisy is a record of the poet's wedding journey, brought in after years to mind by a faded flower. The lines To Frederick Denison Maurice,† "the truest Christian he ever knew," recall a controversy of the past and picture the surroundings of the poet's home in the Isle of Wight. The Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington and The Charge of the Light Brigade, Tennyson's two most famous patriotic poems, need no comment. The early printed versions of each underwent even more than the customary revision, the labour of the file, and

* Maurice had dedicated his Theological Essays to Tennyson.

† Even this short poem was considerably altered in later versions. Lushington, comparing it with The Daisy, remarked of the latter : "How the simple change in the last line from a dactyl to an amphibrachys changes a mere experiment into a discovery in metre."

in their present form are very different from the originals.

As a whole, the volume may be noted as containing some interesting experiments in metre. Maud, the Ode on the Death of the Duke, The Daisy, the lines To Maurice, Will, all exhibit Tennyson moving in hitherto untrodden metrical paths. I do not know that any English poet has employed and achieved success in so many and various measures.

CHAPTER V.

AMONG the books published by William Caxton at the first printing-press set up in England, at Westminster, was Sir Thomas Malory's Morte d'Arthur in the year 1485. Malory was a compiler of genius, with a real skill in language and a real feeling for the spirit of the old legends which he attempts to unify. He so alters, arranges, and combines the stories, so nobly conceives the cycle of the Arthurian chivalric romances, that at his hands the whole is clothed, and indeed for the first time, with almost epic interest, the interest of simple yet heroic actions on an ample field, unified by their relation to a great central figure. Into the neglected treasury of chivalric legend—neglected from the time that the Renaissance revived men's sympathies with classic ideals and the myths of older days—into this treasury of chivalric legend, neglected and even scorned by so great and true a poet as Chaucer, Malory stepped boldly, and committing a splendid theft from contemporary or older writers on the Continent, made himself the undisputed possessor in English prose of the story of King Arthur and his knights. In his version the story is at once more human, more tragic, more convincing, and more natural than in that of any of the earlier compilers ; and for this reason it is that the more recent poets, and Tennyson among them, follow Malory, except in some instances, in preference to any of his predecessors in other languages who handled the same subject. And the name of his predecessors is legion and of many nationalities, divided from each other by long centuries.

The origin of the Arthur story is lost in the mists of remote Celtic tradition. There are traces of a hero named Arthur even before the time in which we hear of him as a king who lived and reigned in the sixth century, and of whom the tale was told that he united all the petty princedoms under his sovereign rule, and as the champion of his people and of the Christian faith long resisted the invading bands of the Saxon heathen. But the earliest references to Arthur in the lays of the Welsh bards celebrate him as a valiant hero only, and it is not until we come to the accounts of Nennius,* and especially to those of Geoffrey of Monmouth, that the romantic and marvellous elements enter, that we hear of him as rex quondam rexque futurus, and that the legends begin to take the shape and display the character with which we are now familiar. To the influence of Geoffrey of Monmouth's version,† compiled according to his own words from "a certain very ancient book in the British tongue," may be traced the inexhaustible harvest of chivalric romances which grew up around the person of the mythic

* Popularly supposed to have been a writer of the seventh century, but really much later—probably the twelfth.

† Geoffrey of Monmouth was consecrated Bishop of St. Asaph in 1152. Before that date he composed the Chronicon sive Historia Britonum, a work which the author professes to have translated from a chronicle entitled Brut of Brenhined, a history of the kings of Britain, found in Brittany, and given him by Walter Calenius, Archdeacon of Oxford.

British prince. How far Geoffrey may have been the conduit pipe through which real historical facts were conveyed is, indeed, difficult to determine, but that the greater part of his work is fiction, partly, perhaps, even fiction of his own invention, is more than probable. With him the legends entered upon the period of their Christian and chivalric treatment in the metrical romances of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, both in French and (later) in English. In these romances Arthur becomes the ideal knight, the founder of the noble brotherhood of the Round Table. A king of mysterious lineage and endowed with supernatural gifts, he keeps his court at Caerleon, and thence his chosen knights go forth on knightly quests, to succour the distressed and helpless, to protect women, and do service in their honour, and to venture themselves in every heroic contest which may issue in glory and the triumph of justice and virtue. The whole atmosphere of these romances is charged with enchantment and mysticism, the imagination ranges freely, and the bare outlines of the original history are by this time completely lost in the colour and variety of the new poetic setting. It will be seen, then, that the Arthurian cycle had its origin in remote antiquity, its germ in ancient Celtic tradition; that, after it had already undergone many and important variations, and received accretions from various sources, it passed, mainly through the version of Geoffrey of Monmouth, into the hands of the French *trouvères and German minnesingers, and returned again to England to find its way into ballad literature, and eventually into the Morte d'Arthur of Malory, Tennyson's main source for the Idylls.

There is yet another source to which Tennyson is indebted.* In 1849, Lady Charlotte Guest translated into English a Welsh collection, entitled the Mabinogion, containing tales not to be found in Malory, but of about the same date, the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Although these stories were in all probability also originally translated from the French, they display a character of their own which distinguishes them from the stories of the Morte d'Arthur. Matthew Arnold and other critics have found in these chivalric versions of the Arthurian legend traces of a greater antiquity. "These are no mediæval personages," Arnold writes in his Celtic Literature; "they belong to an older pagan mythological world. The first thing that strikes one in reading the Mabinogion is how evidently the mediæval story-teller is pillaging an antiquity of which he does not fully possess the secret; he is like a peasant building his hut on the site of Halicarnassus or Ephesus: he builds, but what he builds is full of materials of which he knows not the history, or knows by glimmering tradition merely; stones 'not of this building,' but of an older architecture, greater, cunninger, more majestic." The English literary history of the Arthurian legends from Malory to Tennyson is rather a curious history of projects than of achievements. The great dramatic period of our literature produced one play only on an Arthurian subject, The Misfortunes of Arthur, presented at Gray's Inn before the Queen in 1587, the author, Thomas Hughes. References to the legends occur in a few passages in Shakespeare, but his only connexion with them—a bond of the slightest—is to be found in the fact that the plots of King Lear and of Cymbeline were originally taken from the chronicle of Geoffrey of Monmouth, though Shakespeare himself derived them from Holinshed. With Spenser, gleams of the Arthurian romance shine through the texture of his strangely-woven song, where Aristotelian scheme, classic myth, and Italian verse-form are the conspicuous elements; but Spenser was not destined to unify the Arthurian legends. A greater than Spenser came near doing so.

In his youth, Milton tells us, "I betook me among those lofty fables and romances which recount in solemn cantos the deeds of knighthood, founded by our victorious kings, and from thence had in renown over all Christendom." He had for long in contemplation an epic poem whose subject should be taken from ancient British history,* but a higher argument claimed him, and the Arthuriad remained unwritten. Dryden, too, contemplated an epic poem on a national theme, but hesitated, doubtful whether to choose as subject Arthur conquering the Saxons, or Edward the Black Prince, in his Spanish wars. The times, however, were not ripe for such an effort. As Scott writes:

" Dryden in immortal strain
Had raised the Table Round again,
But that a ribald king and court
Bade him toil on to make them sport."

The worthy knight, Sir Richard Blackmore, was the first to achieve the distinction of a completed

Arthurian epic. "In leisure hours he dealt in epic song," and produced several poems of epic proportions, if not of epic dignity, among them Prince Arthur and King Arthur; but Blackmore failed to make good his claim to be England's national poet, and it was not until after the dawn of the Neo-Romantic epoch, of which Chatterton was the true harbinger, that the long-delayed poetic justice was done to the ancient British legends. The life of these legends was renewed in poetry and art by the Romantic revival. Scott in his Bridal of Triermain treated an episode from the romances. Heber, Wordsworth, Lytton, and others found in them stimulus for the imagination, and there were few among the poets who were Tennyson's contemporaries for whom the spell of the old enchantment was not too strong to be resisted.

Subjects drawn from the Arthurian story appear in several of Tennyson's early poems: in the 1832 volume The Lady of Shalott, Sir Galahad and Sir Lancelot and Queen Guinevere in 1842. The Palace of Art contains a reference to Arthur—"mythic Uther's deeply wounded son;" and elsewhere may be found traces of the effect made by the beauty of these tales of old-world chivalry upon his mind. That the ambition to weave the Arthurian legends into a poetic whole was early cherished by him is evidenced in The Epic, which, published among the Poems of 1842, introduced the fragment, Morte d'Arthur, where the intention* to give a permanent poetic form to the Arthurian history is indicated:—

* Or its tentative accomplishment,

“‘You know,’ said Frank, ‘he burnt
His epic, his King Arthur, some twelve books.’” *

In this fragment a new note is struck, the pre-Raphaelite mediæval style of The Lady of Shalott and Sir Galahad has given place to a manner worthy of epic material. The Morte d'Arthur, then, opens the long period of his life during which Tennyson was more or less occupied with his epic scheme.† This is the poem referred to by Landor, who wrote in 1837: “A Mr. Moreton, a young man of rare judgment, read to me a manuscript by Mr. Tennyson, very different in style from his printed poems. The subject is the death of Arthur. It is more Homeric than any poem of our time, and rivals some of the noblest parts of the Odyssea.”

For more than a decade we hear no more of the design, but in 1857 was published a small volume, already mentioned, Enid and Nimue; or, The True and the False, which had a very brief spell of public life, being immediately withdrawn from publication. In June of the next year, 1858, Clough, “heard Tennyson read a third Arthur poem—the detection of Guinevere, and the last interview with Arthur.” This, entitled Guinevere, together with three other poems, Enid,‡ Vivien, and

* Mrs Ritchie quotes Tennyson as saying: ‘When I was twenty-four, I meant to write a whole great poem on it (the Arthurian story), and began it in the Morte d'Arthur. I said I should do it in twenty years, but the reviews stopped me. By Arthur I always meant the soul, and by the Round Table the passions and capacities of a man. There is no grander subject in the world than King Arthur.’

† A long visit to Caerleon on Usk prepared the way for the descriptions of scenery in the Idylls.

‡ Afterwards entitled Geraint and Enid, Merlin and Vivien, Lancelot and Elaine, Arthur and Guinevere,

Elaine, appeared in 1859 as Idylls of the King, the first occasion upon which the name was employed. Three years later the dedication to the memory of the Prince Consort was prefixed to the poems, which remained unaltered, save for a few unimportant verbal changes. After another interval of seven years, in 1869, four new poems were added—The Coming of Arthur, The Holy Grail, Pelleas and Ettarre, and The Passing of Arthur.* The last named was an extended version of the Morte d'Arthur of 1842. In 1871 The Last Tournament appeared in the Contemporary Review, and in 1872 Gareth and Lynette.† After yet another long interval, Balin and Balan, which serves as an introduction to Merlin and Vivien, was published in 1885, and in 1888 Geraint and Enid was divided into two parts, the first being named The Marriage of Geraint, and the second retaining the former title.

Such is the external history of the Idylls of the King. The history of the author's purpose and its gradual development, as indicated in the additions and alterations, made from time to time in the text of successive editions, can here be but briefly sketched. Through fully half a century, as I have shown, the Arthurian story had possession of Tennyson's mind. Throughout that period it seems as if he were slowly feeling his way towards the best solution of the difficult problem—how to create a living interest in the old-world legend, how to re-tell these tales of centuries ago, that they might touch the modern mind,

* "The Coming and the Passing of Arthur," said Tennyson, "are simpler and more severe in style, as dealing with the awfulness of Birth and Death."

† The lines "To the Queen" were added in this year.

affect with real power the men who live the altered life of to-day.

Although the subject was in many respects suitable for a great English poem, and offered practically an open field which any poet might make his own possession, were his genius equal to the task, the choice of method was a difficult one. The Arthurian romances embody the ideals of chivalry, but they were never true to the real life of any age, and some indeed have thought that no treatment, however skilful, could give them more than a poetic-antiquarian interest :

“ No part have these wan legends in the sun,
Whose glory lightens Greece and gleams on Rome.
Their elders live ; but these—their day is done ;
Their records written on the winds, in foam
Fly down the wind, and darkness takes them home.
What Homer saw, what Virgil dreamed, was truth
And died not, being divine ; but whence, in sooth,
Might shades that never lived win deathless youth ?”

It was too late by many centuries to build out of these misty legends the heroic epic, whose readers should find in Arthur a real king, and follow with believing, beating heart the record of his knightly deeds. Whatever else may be said of Tennyson, we must willingly grant the wisdom of his choice of the only way in which the material could be handled with any measure of success in these later days. An allegorical treatment of the romance of Arthur was the sole possible treatment for a poet of the nineteenth century. Nor did the romances present any features incompatible with such treatment ; they lent themselves readily to it. Already around the person of Arthur had collected many myths of symbolic import, through which inner meanings ran, and the whole story had been treated by Malory in the spirit of one who, while he tells a particular tale, relates a chapter of universal human history.

The idea of an allegorical treatment of the Arthurian story was, I think, present with Tennyson from the first, but his conception of the whole scheme was in the beginning far from definite, and the presence of the symbolism is hardly felt in the four Idylls of 1859. He was not sure how far the allegory might be justly carried. By Arthur, as he tells us, he always meant the Soul, but it was not until 1869, when he published Pelleas and Ettarre and The Holy Grail, that the allegoric purpose is clearly present. In the address to the Queen, which concludes the whole, and was published in 1872, he sets forth the aim of his work, and speaks of it as an “ old imperfect tale,

New-old and shadowing Sense at war with Soul
 Rather than that gray king, whose name, a ghost,
 Streams like a cloud, man-shaped, from mountain-peak,
 And cleaves to cairn and cromlech still ; or him
 Of Geoffrey's book, or him of Malleor's, one
 Touch'd by the adulterous finger of a time
 That hover'd between war and wantonness,
 And crownings and dethronements.”

The constant revision to which, almost until the last, the various poems were subjected was designed to emphasise their true character, and to bind them into a closer unity. After the publication of Balin and Balan, in 1885, Tennyson wrote but one other poem, a lyric, on an Arthurian subject. In Merlin and the Gleam the poet seems to allegorise his own life and teaching, and, in his faith that the ideal is indeed the vera lux that must lead the world, once more restores the hope that in the failure of the Table Round had seemed almost wholly quenched.

I have said that Tennyson's treatment of the Arthurian romances was the only possible one—a frank literary and symbolic handling of the legendary cycle ; it remains to ask, Was it successful? I shall not stay to discuss the wisdom of the choice of title, nor to enter upon the barren logomachy, so long waged by the critics, whether or no the poems constitute an epic. Like all Tennyson's poems, the lyrics excepted, the Idylls of the King have the elements of strength and of weakness, we may say the elements of the author's characteristic strength, the elements of his characteristic weakness. The cardinal defect, inherent in the subject, a lack of unity, was precisely the defect which the limitations of Tennyson's genius rendered him least able to repair. It would have been repaired by Milton had he essayed the task ; I believe no English poet since Milton possessed the architectural faculty, the unifying imagination essential to complete success. Tennyson's Idylls are a series of pictures—as their name indeed implies ; there is no link strong enough to bind the constituent parts into an organic whole. The figure of Arthur is too dim, too undefined to serve as centre to the movement of the various poems ; he comes and passes away, but his influence is slight. Within the work itself, it can hardly be said that there is “a beginning, a middle point, and an end,” as Aristotle justly demanded in an epic. We are conscious that many more such poems might have been added, that some might have been omitted without serious disturbance to the poem as a whole. To say so is to say what cannot be asserted of an organic growth, to which nothing can be added and from which nothing can be taken away. Yet in the room of unity we have symmetry, a delicate balance and proportion, artistic and admirable, with which we may well be content.

Turning from the poem as it might have been to a consideration of it as given to us, the most serious defect arises out of the unfortunate contrast between the cold, colourless, faultless Arthur and the human-hearted though sinning Lancelot. It is not enough to say that, viewed in its spiritual meanings, the comparison must be in favour of the blameless king. The story affects us before the symbolism is apparent, and our sympathies are enlisted on the side of flesh and blood, and cannot again be alienated. Our instincts teach us that Lancelot is the nobler type of manhood. The story, if the poem is to be perfect, must be complete and interesting in itself. But the necessities of the symbolism clash at times and cannot be harmonised with the tale, and when "we come suddenly upon the moral, it gives us a shock of unpleasant surprise, a kind of grit, as when one's teeth close on a bit of gravel in a dish of strawberries and cream." This and the inevitable sense of depression which the failure of its ideals, the final ruin of Arthur's once noble court, leaves within the mind, the faults without remedy. But the compensations are not a few—such, indeed, as Tennyson rarely failed to supply in any work. In the *Holy Grail and in Guinevere, as in Elaine and indeed in almost all the poems, there are as noble passages as any to be found in the whole range of English poetry. The felicitous rendering, too, of natural scenery, and its equally felicitous use for purposes of illustration, are as conspicuous as ever. Take the often-quoted lines that follow :

* "I have expressed there my strong feeling as to the Reality

" So dark a fore-thought roll'd about his brain,
As on a dull day in an Ocean cave
The blind wave feeling round his long sea-hall
In silence."*

The greatest artist in colour among modern poets is present in the Idylls from the first line to the last.

Of the allegory itself, no strict interpretation is possible, nor is it desirable. But it may be outlined as the history of the soul of man in its warfare upon earth.† In Arthur, who builds and reigns in Camelot, we have symbolised the soul and the city that the genius of man has erected for himself—the whole ordered social fabric, the human institutions built up to serve his needs. In Guinevere the beauty of the world of sense is typified, the beauty which the soul would fain make its own, finding in it a winning, inexhaustible charm. But in the world of sense, with all its charm, there resides a principle which is antagonistic to the spirit ; while it attracts it also repels, and the problem which man has to face lies here. He is a citizen of two worlds, a spiritual and a material, and while this life lasts a perfect reconciliation is impossible. Arthur comes and establishes his kingdom upon earth, and for a time all goes well. The ideals of the soul are slowly but surely organizing a human after the pattern of a divine society. But the difficulties are many, human weaknesses and frailties hinder the evolution of a perfect reign of love and law, the hostile forces are ceaselessly at work. In Gareth and Lynette, in Balin and Balan, in Geraint and Enid the warfare is maintained between the spiritual and material influences in the heart of man, and the spiritual are still undefeated. But more powerful forces of evil enter. These in Merlin and Vivien and in Pelleas and Ettarre are triumphant, and the shadow of its approaching dissolution begins to lower over the once splendid court. In The Holy Grail is symbolised the quest for the true spiritual principles, the true religion which throughout the centuries has inspired the noblest souls. But many of the seekers for the Grail are led astray by wandering fires, and only those in whose hearts burns the flame of pure devotion attain to a sight of it. Lancelot is the type of perfect manhood, in whom the love of earthly beauty has not until too late been subdued by a vision of what is still more lovely. With the sin of Lancelot and Guinevere the end draws near; the winter of failure, the final darkness approaches, and the Round Table, "which was an image of the mighty world," is dissolved. But though dissolved, the ideal at which it aimed shines as it ever shone; no failure can dim the brightness of its challenging fires. Arthur, the king that was, the king that will be, is not dead; and in Merlin and the Gleam, though not a part of the poem, the allegory finds its true conclusion. The poet's last word is one of encouragement :

* Written in one of the Ballybunion caves, Ireland.

" After it, follow it,
Follow The Gleam."

The Idylls of the King, when criticism has spoken its last word, may fairly be called a noble poem; perhaps the noblest poem since the Faerie Queen, in the order to which it belongs. For those, indeed, who value breadth and scope of conception in art above all beauty of expression, all exquisiteness of detail; who demand authentic warrant in the idea for each word of the language that conveys it ; who refuse to diction, be it verse or prose, the right to shine in itself, believing that in its highest reach it challenges no attention, but, itself unseen, is but the perfect mirror of the thought or feeling it presents—for those, in a word, who set the whole above the parts that compose it, the Idylls can never rank with the supreme poetry of the world. But it will be conceded by the future, as it has already been conceded in the present, that few of the qualities of enduring poetry are here unrepresented. Steeped in the golden splendours of an heroic past the legends keep their intrinsic power to charm, while, in their modern form, the magic and melody and mystery in which they seem to float diffused, the mediæval glamour of a world of old romance that pervades the whole, the deep spiritual significance of the allegory—with these the poet weaves for many readers the spells of an enchanted land. Let us not, therefore, speak of the grandeur of the Idylls of the King ; let us rather speak of their splendour, their luxuriance of colour, their exquisite grace of word and phrase, their pictorial magnificence, the undying charm of their high and truthful eloquence. Beautiful, indeed, they are, yet with limitations ; καλεπὰ τὰ κάλλιστα—perfection is a difficult mark to hit.

“Tennyson’s plays,” said George Eliot, speaking of Queen Mary and Harold, “run Shakespere’s close.” When one hears criticism of this kind from a writer of genius, one is inclined to say, Let us henceforth forever dispense with criticism. Such criticism is pestilential, it goes far to destroy all standards of excellence in literature, all sense of distinctions; it goes far to create a positive distaste for even the best literature. "Enoch Arden," said Mr. Dawson, an ardent admirer of Tennyson, "is his noblest and best" poem. "I find in it almost every quality of the poet, true sympathy and all the rest. There is not a fine word in it." We are growing more and more accustomed to outrageous insanities in criticism; we seem to find in violence of expression some drug or charm to compensate us for the absence of reality. Like the novelist, the critic rides "the many-headed beast" with whip and spur, and the hour of inexorable justice is delayed a week or a day. That a critic should say of Enoch Arden, therefore, that "there is not a fine word in it," may not surprise us; though the truth is just the opposite of this, that it is a poem in which a simple subject is adorned with all "the fine words," all the wealth of language at the poet's command. It is, as Mr. Bagehot long ago said, a perfect instance of ornate or decorative as opposed to pure art.

"While Enoch was abroad on wrathful seas,
Or often journeying landward; for in truth
Enoch's white horse, and Enoch's ocean-spoil
In ocean-smelling osier, and his face,
Rough-reddened with a thousand winter gales,
Not only to the market-cross were known,
But in the leafy lanes behind the down,
Far as the portal-warding lion-whelp,
And peacock yew-tree of the lonely Hall,
Whose Friday fare was Enoch's ministering."

"So much," as Mr. Bagehot said, "has not often been made of selling fish." We are presented with a portrait of an unreal sailor, painted in unreal colours, upon an unreal canvas, "a sailor crowded all over with ornament and illustration." The key to this poem is to be found in a letter of Fitzgerald's, written just before its composition—"Alfred wants a story to treat, being full of poetry with nothing to put it in."—The subject when found was all but lost beneath the magnificence of its "poetic" treatment. Enoch Arden is the best example that can be selected from the author's works of that weakness in his artistic nature which seemingly made it impossible for him to trust his subject, to permit it to speak for itself. But the grand distinction of the greatest artists is this, that their action predominates over their expression, that they regard the whole more than the parts, the idea, therefore, above the language; and their aim is accomplished not in the luxuriance of their imagery, the wealth of their colour, or the multiplicity of their illustration, but, as I have elsewhere phrased it, when they leave upon the reader's mind one pure, simple, affecting outline, one undying image of perfect feature. In this poem of Tennyson, as in many other of his poems—here, I think, pre-eminently—he errs by overlaying a simple and pathetic tale by splendour of language altogether alien to it, by whose instrumentality it is removed out of the real world of things as they are into an altogether unreal world of things as they are not. The action is not permitted to control the expression, but is really subordinated to it; is made the occasion of a magnificent display of verbal and pictorial wealth. When one thinks of Enoch Arden, one thinks first of that matchless description of the island in the tropics upon which the shipwrecked sailor is thrown: a description, as I say, matchless, but quite unessential to the story, quite out of keeping with the feelings of the shipwrecked sailor, a purple patch which distracts the mind from the main business of the piece, which is to tell a simple, pathetic tale of simple fisher-folk.

It is a noteworthy fact that this poem is among the most popular, if not the most popular, of Tennyson's works ; it certainly has been more frequently chosen for translation into other languages than any other of his poems—a proof, if any were required, how few are the lovers of pure, of restrained, of classic art even among the readers of poetry. The popularity of Enoch Arden is comparable with the popularity of the May Queen, a poem so full of false sentiment and false pathos as to be painful to a reader who can feel how Wordsworth would have permitted such a tale to write itself, and in its sheer simplicity subdue heart and mind. How impossible, too, for an artist in the great style, like Milton, to indulge in these puling sentimentalities ! But it was with poems such as these that Tennyson made his irresistible appeal to the wide circle of his uncritical admirers, an appeal which may be compared with that made by the later pictures of his contemporary, Millais.

A noticeable contrast to Enoch Arden is the first of the dialect poems, the Northern Farmer, published in the same volume. This is a study of real life ; here the patient, observing eye has been at work, here the artist for once conceals his art, and speaks the real language of men. The poems in dialect are more dramatic, because infinitely more true to life, than any work can ever be of the order to which Enoch Arden belongs. They are remarkable, too, as revealing an unexpected humorist in the aristocratic poet, a sympathetic humorist, who was at home in the rural cottage as much as in the courts of princes. The Northern Farmer was another proof of the extraordinary versatility of Tennyson's genius, and in some respects the most striking poem in this volume. Aylmer's Field, of which the story was told to the author by his friend Woolner, the artist, is redeemed from slightness by the intensity and fervour of its rhetoric, culminating in the funeral sermon. In Sea Dreams the decorative method employed in Enoch Arden is again conspicuous, but the theme is trivial and the treatment almost languid. But in *Tithonus the old mastery, the old, inimitable skill is once more apparent. It is in the classical studies that Tennyson's art seems faultless. With all their exquisite beauty of form there is a dignity, a reserve apparent which adds immeasurably to their charm. Ulysses, Tithonus, Lucretius, and Demeter are something more than delicately woven dreams, phantasies in colour and sound. Akin to The Lady of Shalott, they yet possess something higher; here is the Greek sharpness of outline, with the Greek simplicity of motive; here is a chiselled perfection of phrase. The classical studies are, in my judgment, the poems of the author which give us by far the highest sense of his power, whether intellectual or poetic.

Of the remaining poems in this volume, The Grandmother may be noted as a favourite with the poet himself, and The Flower as a not unnatural protest against the fickle admirers and critics who found nothing in the poet's work to reverence until it became the object of imitation, and then, again, when "most could raise the flower, since all had got the seed," found it of trivial value. The other pieces were The Voyage, The Ringlet (afterwards omitted), The Sailor Boy,

* First appeared in the second number of the first volume of Cornhill (1860).

previously published—in a Miscellany, “The Victoria Regia”—in 1861, The Islet, and The Attempts at Classic Metres in Quantity, which had appeared in the Cornhill for December, 1863. In these last Tennyson’s delicate perception of form enabled him to reproduce for English readers the musical aroma of some of the most complex classical metres, never before so exquisitely rendered. To them we may here add the Sapphic stanza, written for Professor Jebb’s Primer of Greek Literature, in which, as he tells us, the genuine Greek cadence is preserved :

“ Faded every violet, all the roses ;
Gone the glorious promise, and the victim,
Broken in this anger of Aphrodite,
Yields to the victor.”

It may be said of this volume that it was a series of experiments, most of which were comparative failures. In the domestic idyll Tennyson was not working the true vein of his genius. Enoch Arden, Aylmer’s Field, and Sea Dreams were subjects which Wordsworth might have treated, but the very simplicity of the themes here chosen jars with the jewelled phrasing, the ornate manner of Tennyson’s setting. The artist is too conspicuously present in his creations.

CHAPTER VI.

VERSATILITY and growth in power were the signal features of Tennyson's art and artistic life. That the author of The Miller's Daughter should become the author of The Revenge, that in the brain of the poet of Claribel there was hidden the poet of The Dramas. Lucretius, that Queen Mary and Harold and Becket belong to the same life-history as The Lotus-Eaters, The Talking Oak, and Locksley Hall—this is a source of natural admiration and wonder. And how plainly in his work appear the qualities and defects which mark the achievement of a scholar and recluse! That it is so may perhaps best be realised if one thinks of the events of the age in which his life was cast, and how little his poetry reflects or moralises them. Born while the shadow of Napoleon's destiny overhung Europe, in the year of Talavera, which drove Soult from Portugal, his early life was passed during the troublous close of the reign of George III. He was busy with Claribel and Madeline and Mariana in the year of the second French Revolution, and with Eleänore, The Miller's Daughter and Cenone, when the great Reform Bill was introduced by Lord Grey and a civil war almost precipitated in England. Tennyson saw the abolition of slavery, the Chartist Agitation, the rise of the Second Empire in France, the Tractarian Movement, the Indian Mutiny, the Franco-Prussian War, and many another event which profoundly stirred the hearts of men, his contemporaries. He saw the application of steam to marine and land locomotion, and all the wonders of the new reign of Science. Yet in an age so full of change, so constructive of the future, he held his own course in almost exclusive devotion to his art and to the thoughts which live and move in the deeper currents of human life and feeling, having their home not amid the passing events of the hour, but in the underworld of the soul's unquenchable desire and unearthly ideals.

There is a passage in the Georgics of Virgil in which the poet chooses for himself not rivalry with the majestic muse of Lucretius, nor for subject the lofty philosophic theme, but the countryside, the woods and streams. Tennyson when he speaks of Milton seems to make a similar choice.

" Me rather all that bowery loveliness,
The brooks of Eden mazily murmuring—"

He knew where his own strength lay, and that the future would find in him not an epic nor a dramatic poet, the priest of universal humanity, but a scrupulous artist who, in an age and country which more and more gives itself to the worship of the gods of a material world, preserved in his poetry an aloofness from such idolatry, and attached himself to the highest things of the mind and heart, making his art a mirror of the best of which his times had vision; an artist who found no less than in the achievements of her children, in the natural beauties of his native country, in the skies and meadows, woods and waters of England, a subject near his own heart, to the interpretation of which he brought the devotion of a lover, and achieved as his reward a lover's triumph, consummate and indisputable. This also is the true point of view for the critics who are lovers of Tennyson, the point of view from which his greatness is most clearly discernible. While we stand at this point we can hardly praise too highly. But to forget that there are other points of view is to forget the true function of criticism, which is to draw distinctions, to insist upon distinctions, and to show wherein they exist. Splendidly versatile as was Tennyson's genius, the critic must say, then, he was not successful as a dramatist : two things stood in the path of his success. The genius of the time was against him ; the seclusion in which he chose to live his life was even more against him. Had any large share of the dramatic faculty fallen to his lot, these hostile influences might in some degree have been overcome ; as it was, the discerning observer marks with surprise not, indeed, his failure, but the measure of his success. I have already indicated that we need not look for our author's strength in breadth and scope of conception, in imaginative synthesis, but in the balance of his judgment, in his analytic subtlety, in his assimilative powers, in the rich accessories of his artistic detail. To the most ordinary observer the plays are evidently full of fine things ; for example, the second scene in the third act of *Queen Mary is grandly conceived and executed, as is also the concluding scene in the play, but this cannot satisfy us ; fine things do not make, they have never yet made, a drama. We must ask, Are Tennyson's plays dramatically conceived ; that is, do they find their natural home upon the stage ? Is the action an inevitable march ? Is the characterisation vital ? Is the effect one and indivisible ? These questions cannot be answered in the affirmative, and yet in these we have only a few of the essentials of a drama. The plays of Tennyson in any real meaning of the word drama are failures; we may speak of them thus frankly. His admirers will tell us it is not so; they will tell us that Tennyson is a great dramatist, that, as George Henry Lewes said, "The critics of to-morrow will unanimously declare Alfred Tennyson to be a great dramatic genius." It may be so, but some of us, when we read the tragedy of Mary Tudor, will do so more frequently in the version of Sir Aubrey de Vere than in that of the greater poet, and will content ourselves with saying that, although Tennyson's dramas are indisputably failures, they are quite as indisputably charged with high interest, with evidences of fine literary tact, with intellectual force; and, above all, we will connect them with the growing power on the part of the author of holding his hand as he acquired a stronger because a severer style. The years devoted by Tennyson to the composition of his dramatic works left their impress in the nobler, more virile poetry of his later life.

Harold, Becket, and *Queen Mary are studies of great crises in the history of the English race. Their interest is not merely individual, it is also national. In each the conflicting forces of English national life are represented in the persons of prominent men and women, outstanding historical figures of the time. The tragedy in each life is a scene in the great drama of the development of England. The tragedy of Saxon Harold, dead at the feet of Norman William, marked a crisis which seemed to bode for England a bitter future, but it proved the beginning of her greatness. In the tragedy of Becket, the struggle of the Church, the champion of the people's rights against the Crown, is represented in the person of that great churchman and of his king. Once more, what seemed ominous for the future was proved by the future the opening-day of English freedom. In Queen Mary the issue involves both the spiritual and temporal life of England. Shall the nation guide its own destinies, take its own counsel in matters ecclesiastical, as in civil, or do homage to a foreign power and accept the decrees of Rome? Here, again, the cause of liberty rises triumphant from its own ashes, and the darkest hour is seen to be only the hour before the dawn. Throughout these dramas the idea of a Providence in history is the ruling idea in Tennyson's mind, a Providence that shapes the nation's ends, let kings and statesmen rough-hew them how they will.

* "This trilogy of plays," said the author, "portrays the making of England."

Harold, called by the author his "Tragedy of Doom," a play which mingles, as De Vere said, an epic spirit with its dramatic form, was dedicated to Lord Lytton, the son of the Lord Lytton who had attacked Tennyson in the satire of The New Timon. The old quarrel was thus healed, and in the introductory sonnet to Harold the hate-healing influences of time are glanced at, and the blossoming of unexpected good out of the heart of conflict and of evil.

There is much in Harold, as there is much in Queen Mary, to praise; the movement is more rapid, the action predominates over the dialogue and the analysis of emotions to a greater degree than in the earlier play; but no such interest as attaches to the person of Mary is present in it, and thus Harold falls shorter of success. There is little reason to believe that if represented on the stage this play could long hold a place among English dramas whose reappearance is always welcome.

In Becket,* as in Queen Mary, Tennyson, though he attains no dramatic success, creates striking characters in the persons of the stern Ecclesiastic and the unhappy Rosamond. Few readers can fail to be impressed by these powerful studies—studies of real insight and force. They redeem Tennyson's dramatic work and preserve our interest in it despite all the faults and weaknesses, which, regarding it as a whole, are too palpably betrayed. Harold cannot rank with either in poetical strength. The Falcon, produced at St. James' Theatre in December, 1879,† is a light, unambitious, fanciful piece, in which the plot, borrowed from the story of Sir Federigo, told by Boccaccio in the ninth novel of the fifth day of the Decameron, gains nothing in the new dramatic setting. The humour of the Falcon is without point, and the element of romance in the original has melted away in the new version. In The Cup, produced at the Lyceum in January, 1881,‡ Tennyson was happier in subject, as well as treatment, and achieved a deserved and unequivocal success. The story, short and tragic, is derived from Plutarch's De Mulierum Virtutibus. The interest is centred in few characters, the action proceeds rapidly, and the catastrophe is impressive and pathetic. In this brief drama the author approached very near the production of a play that might have held the stage. He seemed to be progressing in that knowledge of effects and that management of situations without which dramas may be written for the reader, but cannot hold the attention of the spectator. But from unequivocal success

Tennyson passed to unequivocal failure once more. The Promise of May,* written at a friend's request in 1882, was the only prose work published by the representative poet of his time. It was also his only dramatic work in which he touched upon a subject which in so many of his poems he had treated with an intensity of feeling and a delicacy of judgment unsurpassed by any other poet—the problem of the relation between Faith, the daughter of the Heart, and Science, the daughter of the Head. In his dramatic presentation of that problem in its social aspects Tennyson's judgment failed him. Whether intentional or not—and we know on the author's own authority that it was unintentional†—the conclusion inevitably offers itself that out of agnosticism must proceed social ruin, that the loss of religion is the beginning of anarchy. The thesis, in itself perhaps legitimate, is enforced illogically and through an offensive situation. The dramatic instinct is absent from the play as a whole, and we need not wonder that critics, no less than people, felt that it was unworthy of its great author.

It was a happy circumstance that in his last essay in drama Tennyson turned again to a world of old romance. The Foresters, an English woodland piece, though slight in texture, possesses the true Tennysonian charm. The plot is that of one of the best-known midland tales, told in the spirited ballad, A Lytel Geste of Robyn Hood. The atmosphere is the atmosphere of As You Like It. There breathes through it the poet's love of England and English traditions and English folk, and in the forest walks there lurks no concealed problem of modern life. An idyllic masque, it recalls to the senses the glad sights and sounds of natural country life, and mingles with them the dream-like enchantment of a legend that recounts a merry, roguish life lived long ago. In this romantic pastoral Tennyson's dramatic essays found a fitting and fortunate conclusion.

There can be no more striking passage in the history of poetry than that which puts on record the fruitage of Tennyson's genius in old age. Few even among thoughtful critics conceived of his dramatic period as other than a day of decline, filled with experiments in an ungenial form by one who had already exhausted his best powers in the work that lay behind him. Nothing more was expected of Tennyson, the book seemed naturally and not unworthily closed, nor was there need to await further development ere assigning to him his place among the poets of his race and country. Yet in the drama he had lost and found himself. Out of the heart of failure there blossomed a marvellous success, the more marvellous, perhaps, because unlooked for. The Ballads of 1880 had a vigour, a breadth, a movement surpassing any previous volume. The pulse of action, the spirit of true dramatic art, beat strongly in poems free at last from all traces of daintiness, of superfine graces. The very music breathed a nobler air and moved to manlier measures. The Monologue, a form doubtless suggested by Browning's example, prevails, and is nowhere used even by Browning with greater ease or finer talent for rapid effects. In *The Revenge and in The Defence of Lucknow we have

* The closeness with which Tennyson followed his authority—Raleigh—in his account of the fight between the Revenge and a ballads comparable with any in English ; in Columbus a stirring force of passion and passion-matching language ; in the dialect poems, The Northern Cobbler and The Village Wife, a powerful realism ; in De Profundis a deep-reaching philosophy, for which it will be in vain to look in the poetry of twenty years previous. A full and grave maturity shines in the verse of Tennyson's closing years.

The Ballads and Other Poems were inscribed to the poet's grandson, another Alfred Tennyson, then a year and a half old:

" Crazy with laughter and babble and earth's new wine."

In addition to the poems already mentioned, the volume contained The First Quarrel, Rizpah, Sir John Oldcastle, Lord Cobham, The Sisters, In the Children's Hospital, A Prefatory Sonnet, contributed to the first number of The Nineteenth Century, edited by Tennyson's friend, Mr. Knowles ; Sonnets to W. H. Brookfield and to Victor Hugo, and a sonnet entitled Montenegro ; translations, The Battle of Brunanburh and Achilles over the Trench, the lines To the Princess Frederica of Hanover, the lines for Sir John Franklin's cenotaph in Westminster, and the lines To Dante. The only other poem not mentioned above which was printed in this volume was The Voyage of Maeldune. Maeldun is the hero of an ancient Celtic romance.*

" navy of Spain " is only matched by that of Wolfe in his famous verses on The Burial of Sir John Moore. Much of Tennyson's ballad, save for the metrical arrangement, is almost word for word taken from Raleigh's pamphlet. (Reprinted by Edward Arber, 1871.)

* See Joyce's Ancient Celtic Romances,

The story belongs to the group of tales of sea voyages of which St. Brendan is the best known. The marvels seen by Maildun and his men are only partially related in Tennyson's ballad, and the tone of the original is lost, but the fantastic imaginative splendour of the legend could hardly be hidden even in its modern dress.

The Tiresias volume was inscribed to Robert Browning, and strikes the personal as its predominant note. In the dedication to Fitzgerald, the translator of Omar Khayyam, and in the epilogue Tiresias and which speaks of his death; in the teaching Other Poems. of the Ancient Sage, where in the person of 1885. the seer Tennyson sums the beliefs of his own life; in the prefatory poem to his brother's volume of Sonnets, published after the author's death—in all these we may read the veteran poet's sense of an end not very far off :

“ Remembering all the golden hours,
Now silent, and so many dead.”

While they retain the original Tennysonian sweetness of phrase, the poems in this book are fuller of interest, deeper of tone, chaster of expression than those of his youth. Tiresias is another piece of classic sculpture for the gallery in which Lucretius, Ulysses, and Tithonus had already place. Balin and Balan, an unexpected addition to the Idylls, was written as an introduction to Merlin and Vivien. The Dead Prophet is a characteristic, indignant, passionate remonstrance against “the scandal and the cry” which in these latter days are wont to follow upon the biographer's revelations of the private life of public men. Here, there is little doubt, by the Dead Prophet is meant Tennyson's old friend, Carlyle ; and the profanation of his name by curious, scandal-loving readers, no less than the opportunity given them by the biographer, is the subject of the poet's savagest scorn and invective.

To me *The Ancient Sage is the poem of by far the greatest interest in this volume, for can we not say that we have here the authentic, outspoken expression of the poet's creed, the first and last word in his confession of faith? I have already spoken of that creed as the creed of the higher emotions. I may say of the faith in his own words, that it is "a faith beyond the forms of faith." The spiritual energies of his nature flowed into no mould of traditional doctrine, but they were the inspiration of his solemn visions and prophetic hopes. In the Two Voices, the poem of his youth which most closely corresponds to this of his age, the same problems are presented, but presented in a clever, logical texture, whose threads are finely drawn, but whose conclusions leave us cold. In the later poem, more vigorous and more dramatic in conception, from out a life's experience, from out a poet's heart of fire springs the living word of an intense and secure conviction. If the future hold for men an increase of knowledge which may warrant an increase of hope, then, indeed, "they will look back on Tennyson as no belated dreamer, but as a leader who, in the darkest hour of the world's thought, would not despair of the destiny of man. They will look back on him as Romans looked back on that unshaken Roman who purchased at its full price the field of Cannæ, on which at that hour the victorious Hannibal lay encamped with his Carthaginian host."†

* "The whole poem," said the author, "is very personal."

† F. W. H. Myers, Tennyson as Prophet.

The results of Tennyson's studies in the drama may be seen in his heightened power in dealing with such situations as those of The Wreck, The Flight, and that most tragic of any in Tennyson's poetry, or, indeed, possible, in Despair. The lines To Virgil are the expression of a life-long affection for a poet with whom, perhaps, Tennyson had more in common than any other, while the lines entitled Frater Ave atque Vale convey to English readers something of the beauty and pathos with which Catullus clothes the emotion of a wistful regret. The Charge of the Heavy Brigade falls short of the earlier battle-piece, and is less stirring than the account from which it is taken; but in Hands all Round, originally published in 1852, the patriotic ardour of England's most patriotic poet is bravely and nobly sung. The remaining poems published in this volume are the epitaphs on Gordon, Caxton, and Lord Stratford de Redclyffe, Freedom, To the Duke of Argyll, Helen's Tower (written at the request of his friend, Lord Dufferin), To H. R. H. Princess Beatrice, Early Spring, To-Morrow (an Irish tale in dialect), The Spinster's Sweet Arts, and the lines (subsequently) entitled Poets and their Bibliographies. In the last-mentioned verses Tennyson glances at the poetic methods of Virgil and of Horace, methods similar to his own in the ceaseless labour of the file, and resents, with some impatience, the attention of the critics. Doubtless that impatience was in no slight degree due to the parallelisms adduced by them from other writers to many of Tennyson's own thoughts and phrases, and to the implied suggestion that his assimilative powers were conspicuously greater than his inventive. Tennyson was indisputably a great borrower, but he borrowed as only genius borrows, and had he not repudiated with somewhat unnecessary heat and protestation the charge of plagiarism, the critic might not have found so keen a delight in pressing home the charge.

The greater part of the 1886 volume was occupied by the text of the drama (partly prose), The Promise of May, and, with the exception of the poem which gave its name to the book, there was little of interest among the new verses. The Fleet and The Ode on the Opening of the Indian and Colonial Exhibition may be passed without comment. The later Locksley Hall is in part a philippic against the moral degradation, the moral infirmities of the age, a subject to which the poet returned, but with a larger motif, in Vastness, published in Demeter and Other Poems in 1889. The seriousness of their outlook upon life, the intensity of their feeling, the sincerity and depth of these poems harmonises with the fuller music, the less daintily wrought manner of Tennyson's later and stronger style. The impeachment, passionate though it be, in the later Locksley Hall, of the littleness of man, is full of stern justice—

“ However we brave it out, we men are a little breed.”

(Maud.)

In Vastness the poet makes the pathetic comparison between the best and the worst in man, between his aspirations and his achievements, between the narrow, circumscribed boundaries of his little life and the infinite ocean that stretches away on all sides of his island-spot of earth. Vain, paltry, and meaningless, the history of the human race dwarfed in the immensities of boundless times and spaces becomes no more than

“ a trouble of ants in the light of a million million of suns.”

Here as elsewhere in Tennyson's poetry the only refuge from permanent intellectual confusion is found in the conviction that the soul and God stand sure, that

“ the dead are not dead, but alive.”

If the human interest in the youthful poems of Tennyson was slight, the later are almost overcharged with emotion. Colour and melody and fragrance were exchanged for anxious questionings upon the deepest problems of life and death, and in some poems so intensely fraught were they with human feeling, that the passionate expression was almost painfully affecting.

In Owd Roä, a rustic study that belongs to the same class as The Northern Farmer, in Forlorn, Happy, The Ring and Romney's Remorse, the passion of sympathy with suffering hearts thrills in the verse till it touches the infinite of pathos, while in Merlin and The Gleam and Crossing the Bar even the flute-like sweetness of the youthful lyrics is surpassed, and the voice of the poet-seer reaches in these poems an accent of sacred and thrilling impressiveness.

In Demeter and Persephone we have a poem equal to anything that the author ever gave us, a poem that with Lucretius, Ulysses, and the other classical studies, will keep pace with the years, nor ever suffer wrong at the hands of time.

Akbar's Dream, the veteran poet's last volume, was in the press at the time of his death, and was published but a few weeks later. Though it contained nothing to increase, it sustained to the full his reputation, and fitly closed the long and bright career. The Death of Ænone, dedicated in a new and difficult verse-form to Dr. Jowett, the Master of Balliol, is a continuation and conclusion of the Ænone of 1832. The blank verse freely and admirably handled in this poem, as in St. Telemachus and in Akbar's Dream, is the stronger, less opulent verse of his later life, learnt in his dramatic period—less ornate but no less musical than that of the Morte d'Arthur and The Princess.

St. Telemachus may be taken as a companion study to St. Simeon Stylites, the record of "a deed that woke the world," marking the contrast between the fruitful influences of a single good action and the barren virtues of a life of asceticism. In Akbar's Dream Tennyson touches yet again upon the old matters of the meaning and the issues of life, and pleads, as in The Ancient Sage, for a "faith beyond the forms of faith," a religion of charity and hope. The Hymn to the Sun, with which it closes, exhibits all the fine qualities of his poetic workmanship—

"Once again thou flamest heavenward, once again we see thee rise.
Every morning is thy birthday, gladdening human hearts and eyes.
Every morning here we greet it, bowing lowly down before thee,
Thee the Godlike, thee the changeless in thine ever-changing skies.

"Shadow-maker, shadow-slayer, arrowing light from clime to clime,
Hear thy myriad laureates hail thee monarch in their woodland rhyme.

Warble bird, and open flower, and men below the dome of azure
Kneel adoring Him the Timeless in the flame that measures
Time!"

Of the remaining shorter poems in the book, The Dawn and The Making of Man return to the problem of the moral progress of the race, while in Faith, The Silent Voices, and God and the Universe we have the last words of the poet to his fellows and to his own soul on the threshold of the unknown future—

“ ‘ Spirit, nearing yon dark portal at the limit of thy human state, Fear not thou the hidden purpose of that Power which alone is great,
Nor the myriad world, His shadow, nor the silent Opener of the Gate.’ ”

CHAPTER VII.

THE death of Alfred Tennyson seemed almost in a sense to bring the history of English poetry to a close. He had outlived all the great poets whose inspiration was drawn from the quickening, dilating forces of the first quarter of the century ; he had long dominated without a rival the poetic realm in the succeeding and quieter epoch ; he had been for fifty years the acknowledged chief of the poet clan, so perfect a representative of English thought, so closely identified with English ideals, as to be looked upon as the natural voice of the nation's noblest spiritual and intellectual life. Tennyson resumed in himself as its highest type the civilization of the Victorian era. And summing as he did in his own person and in his work the gains of the English race throughout its long and splendid history of a thousand years, he must stand for us, as he will assuredly stand for all the future, as the poetic heir of England's aristocratic, intellectual, and heroic traditions. No such inheritance remains for his successors. The new is the age of democracy, and its poets must quarry their marbles from the virgin rock ; Tennyson built with material that was already shaped, and lay ready to his hand. His inspiration came from the past ; upon the past the eye of his poetic imagination was fixed ; in the traditions of the old masters he exercised himself, and in their schools he learnt the secrets of his art. He was of the order of poets who sum up, who bring to an end, while his friend and contemporary, Browning, was of another order—a pioneer poet, an explorer of new lands, the first adventurer in untilled poetic territory. And for this reason, perhaps, it may be justly said that Tennyson belongs to the history of language rather than to the history of thought. He was a polished speaker; master of an exquisite style ; he was not a natural orator, whose words spring forth to wing the impassioned message of the heart. Consider the contemporaries of his youth and of his age, Wordsworth and Browning. Here were poets, charged, it would seem, with oracles for men, but poets the burden of whose message lay heavy upon them, often indeed out-weighted or outran their immediate power of utterance. Wordsworth not infrequently found verse unsustainable, and Browning stammered in his haste to speak. But when from either source the word came to be spoken, it was abundantly evident that the revealing prophet was at our doors. Tennyson's revelation, as far as there was a revelation, was personal, the revelation of his own heart. Its sorrows and joys and hopes and aspirations—these were the real themes of his verse ; and because these sorrows and joys and hopes and aspirations were also ours, their perfect expression was a wonder and a delight to us. Here were Carmina, verses that might be crooned as “charms” over a heart-dissolving grief to ease its pain, or lilted when language ran to music for very gladness of spirit, or recalled to characterize with magical fitness some natural scene, or to sum in telling phrase a daily experience of every human life. “I sing myself,” he might have said with truth, “and in these transcripts of my heart and mind you will find your own.”

I have said that in the poetry of Tennyson the past of English tradition is resumed ; in it the voice of the poet's own time is also heard, for he was, through half a century, the spokesman, the chief speaker of the English race. If in his early volumes, like Keats, he cared only for beauty and languorous melody, cared only for art as art, for poetry as a source of exquisite sensation, when the genius of the world had taken away the veil from his eyes and he saw life plain, his verse took wider range and graver accent. But while he came to represent the thought of his day, and was in a measure too a prophet of the things that were to be, disclosing the tendencies that ripen in due course into creeds, Tennyson never outstepped the intellectual and ethical traditions of his age and country. The English gentleman and scholar are not far off even in poems that breathe revolt, like Maud, or like the later Locksley Hall "curse the social forms" that delay the day of freedom and of truth. When Science, emboldened by her successes, threatened the gates of the time-honoured citadel of faith, he declined any longer to hymn her praise ; when the dreams of the enthusiast for a new heaven and a new earth seemed about to take shape in revolution, he spoke of law, of freedom that slowly broadens down, and of the red fool-fury of the Seine. Tennyson kept with the main body of English opinion, and was its champion. Thus only in a minor sense was he a shaping or compelling power in social or intellectual development, in the enfranchisement of mind. We may speak more truly of him as a poetic chronicler of the mental life of his time.

A chronicler of the mental life of his time, this we must call him, but we must add, a chronicler who was a consummate artist. And success in poetry of this kind, though far indeed from success in the highest kind, is neither easy nor the product of every generation. To chronicle the best ideas of any generation, it is necessary that one should feel inspired by them ; that one should find them a source of real power ; that one should estimate them as of the first importance, and even find pleasure in them. But this is not possible for all men ; it is rarely possible for the poet whose penetrativeness, moral sagacity, and far, sure gaze disclose to him the true meanings and real issues of things. Such poets, often in advance of their generation, are more likely, save at epochs of rare inspiration, to find the times out of joint, the predominant current of ideas uninspiring, and the world into which they have been born an unweeded garden that runs to seed. The poetical spirit is an exacting spirit. A sympathetic spirit, you will say. Yes, sympathetic, but exacting. The needs of Tennyson's nature were such that he found his age satisfying ; its attitude of mind was his own attitude ; and thus it was that, as the chronicler of its mental life, he gained acceptance. Like Pope, he found the tersest expression for the dominant moods, the ruling ideas of his time, and became the historian of contemporary thought. Tennyson, like Pope, took the surest path to immortality ; and when it is said that he belongs to the history of language rather than to the history of thought, it is meant that, thoughtful as he was, and passionate with the warm human passions of a poet, neither did he present in his work the full features of the age in which he lived, nor had he for that age a message of moment. Like his age, he was himself in doubt about many things, and had no unifying conception, no harmonising hypothesis to offer. On the minds of his own contemporaries Tennyson exerted no intellectual pressure, such as Carlyle exerted, nor did he awaken dulled or sleeping chords in the spiritual life by such strong, animating music as Browning's. His office was to minister to the general mass of readers by holding up the mirror in which their most intimate thoughts and feelings were reflected with charming simplicity, with marvellous exactness.

Tennyson, then, was the spokesman of the English race in an era of art-renaissance, and he that runs may read the cardinal notes of his art—its assimilative power and the cura et diligentia, the unwearied devotion he gave to it. Of that assimilative faculty which made his verse so full-flavoured with reminiscences, so dear to scholars, so pleasant on the ears of those familiar with the poetry of an elder day, more needs not to be written. Not a little of what has been written barely conceals the smile of irony beneath the veil of praise. So much that was beautiful, so little that was new! And indeed many of Tennyson's poems are a veritable cento, a patchwork from Greek and Italian looms. Is it a cause for censure, you will ask, or must one find in these reminiscences an unqualified delight? To me, and I think I need make no defence of myself, the power possessed by Tennyson of reproducing in his verse the music of strains long familiar, of recalling in phrase and echo the best beauties of poets of long ago—to me this power seems an altogether admirable and delightful power. I cannot wish away a line of his poetry that displays it. To quarrel with Lucretius because it is built of materials taken from the De Rerum Natura, with passages like that fine one descriptive of

“ The gods who haunt
The lucid interspace of world and world ”— to quarrel with such a phrase as that used by Cleopatra in The Dream of Fair Women—"I died a queen"—because it is a paraphrase of a fine expression used by Horace of Cleopatra,

"invidens
Privata deduci superbo
 Non humilis mulier triumpho,"

or with the stanza in which Helen of Troy, in the same poem, cries :

"I would the white cold heavy-plunging foam,
 Whirl'd by the wind, had roll'd me deep below,
 Then when I left my home," because if we turn to the sixth Iliad we shall find the original—to quarrel with such a line as "This way and that dividing the swift mind," because it is a translation of Virgil's "Atque animum nunc huc celerem, nunc dividit illuc"—to make a quarrel upon causes like these would be to exhibit a temper unworthy of one bidden to the feasts of the gods. Tennyson is indeed full of translations and reminiscences ; he was a plagiarist, as Virgil and Spenser and Milton and Shelley were plagiarists, but a plagiarist of less assurance. If one has a touch of disquietude in the matter, it is due to this lack of assurance in him. A frank expression of indebtedness to his peers of former time could have detracted nothing from his fame. His plagiarisms, if we must call them so, are likely to trouble us less than his anxiety to disprove them. It might well be replied to a critic who complained of these plagiarisms, that the hints taken by Tennyson were not hints given to him alone ; it might be replied that it is too late for criticism to complain of a poetical method honoured in the practice of the best poets of the ancient as of the modern world ; a poetical method which gave us Lycidas and Adonais and many another lovely poem beside, recalling words sweet on the ears of men long centuries ago, fragrant with the infinite associations and memories that cling around the speech of Homer and Theocritus, of Horace and Virgil and Catullus. If Tennyson failed to be always powerful, he seldom failed to be interesting. And he seldom failed to be interesting because of his close acquaintance with the best writings of the ancients as well as of the moderns, with the masterpieces of Greek art, with the wisest sayings of the philosophers—in a word, with the culture of the world. Tennyson seldom fails to be interesting because of this close acquaintanceship with “the best that has been known and thought in the world,” and because his poetry abundantly displays it.

No less conspicuous in his verse than its wealth of reminiscences is the labor limæ, the care he devoted to it. The marks of an unwearying labour of love are plainly visible in almost every line of his poetry, whether of his youth or age. Are you curious to learn the secrets of the poetical art? There is no poet who goes so near betraying them. There is no poet who has so frequently shown a poem upon the stocks, in process of building. In the many versions of a poem like The Princess, you are admitted to the studio ; you are shown the first rough draft, the elaborated sketch, the completed picture. The instinct and care for form somewhat obscured in the work of his predecessors—this instinct and care for form, which in the early years of the century had suffered temporary eclipse, were early apparent in Tennyson’s poetry. The favouring gale of inspiration and the proud full sail of Scott's and Byron's verse had seemed sufficient to their generation, had in the eyes of their readers left nothing to be desired. The rights of form were reasserted in the poetry of Coleridge and of Keats, and the earliest essays of Tennyson in verse foretold the character of his art, whose final aim was only reached in a laboured perfection of finish. Passing by the boyish verses of 1827, indicative of little more than the presence of strong poetical ambition, the poems of 1832, though still without any grasp of reality, proved the advent of a writer with undoubted skill in words, with music in his brain. The feminine daintiness, the absence of all intensity, of the masculine voice, was the least hopeful sign of his early work, and seemed to indicate little real power behind the picture-music, behind the delicate web of words little real breadth of poetic imagination.

Even his admirers in those early days would have welcomed verses that betrayed less anxious correctness, less highly wrought beauty of diction. The results appeared due to assiduous culture rather than to native strength, and it seemed more than doubtful that the ground could produce a richer or fuller crop. And indeed in Tennyson there is no such spontaneity as amazes us in Keats, there is no such "sweet slipping movement" as in Spenser. In his more ornate and decorative verse the artist is too conspicuous; we admire the skill of the workman more than the quality of the work. But let this be as it may, the admirable poise of his faculties remains to him. Tennyson's nature was finely balanced, and he rises far above the poets whose emotion is merely musical. In the firm balance of his nature, strong as his artistic instincts were, in the firm balance of his nature the artist rarely outran the man. The subordination of the matter to the form is less and less apparent in the succeeding volumes of his poetry. How different is he in this from the poets of to-day! The latter-day poets assure us, and the latter-day critics likewise, that art is all in all, that poetry is style. We have critics not a few who regard sweetness and strength as attributes of style, and are ignorant that they are not attributes of style, but attributes of mind and character, expressed in style. How fortunate that in Tennyson the balance was preserved—the balance between the emotions and the will, between the heart and head, between what is said and the manner of saying it! Because Tennyson's style is the expression of character, and not a palace of emptiness, because he is throughout sane and everywhere guided by a wise knowledge of the poet's craft, he is a true and great artist. To compare him with his successors is to gauge the true measure of his performance. With his successors the balance is lost, and when a man or a poet has nothing to say, to think that it can be said finely, what hallucination! To think that the accent of freshness can be obtained by torturing language, that the great effects in poetry, the effects of Sophocles, of Dante and of Shakespere, their intense significance, can be accounted for by a skill in words, an artisan's dexterity! The great effects in poetry are straightforward effects; the great effects of poetry are those in which the emphasis of expression corresponds to some emphasis of thought, some intensity of feeling. And it is because in Tennyson the artist rarely outran the man that we have confidence in him. If you ask me for the secret of Tennyson's hold upon the mind of his generation, I shall answer you with assurance that it lies in his accent of sincerity, it lies in his literary integrity, in a wholesomeness in his art. For this integrity we value him, and for this the future will value him. The poetry that cannot make for beauty and grace and harmony in human life, since it has practically no bearing upon life at all, such poetry is as vain a thing as the jargon of the critics who commend it, and as transitory.

As the poetic artist of the nineteenth century who best knew his own limitations, and in whom the balance, the compromise between form and matter in which poetry consists, is best preserved, as poetic chronicler of the mental life of his time, and as the interpreter of that spirit of intellectual hesitation which was characteristic of his contemporaries and leads to eclecticism in matters of faith, Tennyson will be remembered. And he will be remembered, although the greatness of his work must be looked for elsewhere than in its scope or imaginative power. The large comprehensiveness, the wide-eyed vision that takes in the spectacle of human life in its vast whole and in the complexity of its parts, this did not belong to him, nor did he share in all the joys and sorrows of mankind. Tennyson's lyrics sing the joys and sorrows of English folk ; he was above and before all the poet of England, the best lover among her poets. For the rest his attitude was retrospective, and when his fancy ranged, the land of its dearest romance lay in the heroic past. "It was written," he said of that exquisite lyric, Tears, idle Tears, "at Tintern Abbey, when the woods were all yellowing with autumn, seen through the ruined windows. It is what I have always felt as a boy, and what as a boy I called the passion of the past. And it is always with me now ; it is the distance that charms me in the landscape, the picture and the past, and not the immediate to-day in which I move.”*

To the colour-school of English poetry, to the lineage of the poets of romance, Tennyson belonged. He did not care to draw in outline, to impress by the naked grandeur of conception. From the first, like Keats, he held that poetry should surprise by a fine excess, by a richness and profusion of beauties, that it should be a veritable cloth of gold. From the first he was for such accessories as should lead the senses captive and enthrall the reader with infinite vistas of delight. Yet his is not the bewildering charm of Spenser's fairyland, the luxuriant undergrowth of beauty in enchanted forests. Rather it is the ordered beauty of a noble English garden, of the English landscape that he loved so well. It was said by Wordsworth of Tennyson : “ He is not much in sympathy with what I should myself most value in my attempts—viz., the spirituality with which I have endeavoured to view the material universe, and the moral relations under which I have wished to exhibit its most ordinary appearances.” It is true that Tennyson was not much in sympathy with such attempts. Few poets indeed have kept with Nature a closer companionship ; her sights and sounds were his most familiar friends. To this close companionship we owe the skilful appropriateness of his backgrounds and the delicate accuracy of their form and colour. Tennyson observed, and observed narrowly ; observed indeed with something akin to the trained scientific eye. There is no need to adduce from his poetry passages

* Cf. The Ancient Sage—“ On me, when boy, there came what then I call'd,” etc.

to prove how loving and how close an eye he kept upon the world around him. Readers of Tennyson do not need to be reminded of such touches as meet us, for example, in a phrase like that descriptive of the yew tree answering a random stroke,

“With fruitful cloud and living smoke”—

such illustrative touches as meet us here,

“Why lingereth she to clothe her heart with love,
 Delaying as the tender ash delays
 To clothe herself when all the woods are green.”

Those who are acquainted with the poetry of Tennyson know that it is a mine of such wealth; they know that he was a true lover of Nature, of her trees and flowers and waters, and her skies and silent stars. They know too that he was a bird lover, and that there are few English birds that have not found mention in his verse. But for all this Wordsworth was right. Tennyson did not, in the same degree as Wordsworth, “see into the life of things,” and when the elder poet’s imagination would have kindled into the flame of unquenchable poesy, Tennyson remained a draughtsman and a colourist, but the draughtsman and colourist who is perhaps the greatest of English idyllic poets. His admirers have much to tell us of his greatness as an epic, of his greatness as a dramatic poet. It will be sufficient for us to maintain an attitude of admiration, but an attitude of admiration qualified by some acquaintance with the great epics and the great dramas of the world. The truth is, that Tennyson’s versatility is a source of critical error, just as Byron’s brilliancy and versatility were a source of critical error. Possessed of a finer judgment but a narrower imaginative range and less strength than Byron, Tennyson essayed, like Byron, song and idyl, epic and drama. Tennyson essayed all these, and on the whole essayed them more successfully than Byron. But as it is merely idle to speak of Byron as a great dramatic or even a great epic poet, it is idle to speak of Tennyson as having achieved greatness in these, the highest departments of the poetic art. The creative artists are few, and though Tennyson was not one of them, though his real power lay in the adornment of familiar themes, in the re-clothing of familiar feelings, so strong and brilliant a writer, so careful and so fine an artist could hardly fail of success, even in fields unsuited to his genius. By reason of his versatility, Tennyson is a difficult poet to characterize. But however his critics may differ upon other points, they will be at one upon this, that his idyllic poems possess a singular and vivid charm, and they will be at one upon this also, that in great measure they possess this charm because in no other poems have the features of English landscape found so admiring and so faithful an interpreter. Here is a poet in whose dealings with Nature there is no mysticism, who sees in her only what all may see, and yet for whom Nature, as seen by the scientific eye, has suffered no loss of beauty, no diminution of her poetic stimulus. For many poets Nature has been the dwelling-place of innumerable spirits, passionate creatures of the flood and field, spirits of forest and stream, lush meadow and gray hill-side. These half-human, half-divine shapes flitted by them in the music of the wind, babbled in the rivulet, or held revel in the cool green depths of their long sea-halls. Upon the minds of their less imaginative readers the appeal made by the fantastic dreams of such poets was necessarily slight. The nature-poetry of Wordsworth required for its due appreciation even a more active and certainly a more spiritual imagination. In Tennyson's world the demand for any activity of imagination on the part of the reader is unapparent; his pictures satisfy the senses and fill the eye. Mark the sharpness of outline, the lucidity and completeness of this, the description of the island in Enoch Arden:

“ The mountain wooded to the peak, the lawns
And winding glades high up like ways to Heaven,
The slender coco's drooping crown of plumes,
The lightning flash of insect and of bird,
The lustre of the long convolvuluses
That coil'd around the stately stems, and ran
Ev'n to the limit of the land, the glows
And glories of the broad belt of the world ;
All these he saw ; but what he fain had seen
He could not see, the kindly human face,
Nor ever hear a kindly voice, but heard
The myriad shriek of wheeling ocean-fowl,
The league-long roller thundering on the reef,
The moving whisper of huge trees that branch'd
And blossom'd in the zenith, or the sweep
Of some precipitous rivulet to the wave,
As down the shore he ranged, or all day long
Sat often in the seaward-gazing gorge,
A shipwreck'd sailor waiting for a sail :
No sail from day to day, but every day
The sunrise broken into scarlet shafts
Among the palms and ferns and precipices ;
The blaze upon the waters to the east ;
The blaze upon his island overhead ;
The blaze upon the waters to the west ;
Then the great stars that globed themselves in Heaven,
The hollow-bellowing ocean, and again
The scarlet shafts of sunrise—but no sail.”

In the poetry of Tennyson Nature is suffused in a mellow light ; she is at peace, charged with a message of rich but quiet beauty. He sought her society for soothing influences, for her infinite lore and her celestial calm, not, as did Wordsworth, to find a presence that disturbed him with the joy of elevated thoughts.

But just as the reader of Wordsworth will feel the absence of spirituality in Tennyson's transcripts of nature, the readers of Browning will miss in him the spiritual fire by which that poet discovers in nature and life and art not the powers that make for rest and peace, but for restless and upward strife ; they will miss in him the spiritual energy which finds the best hopes of the race in the thought

" that man is hurled
From change to change unceasingly,
His soul's wings never furled."

For Tennyson not passion, not aspirations and enthusiasms are man's guiding angels, but love and duty and allegiance ; and while he seeks for quiet waters and for harbours of refuge for the soul upon the voyage of life, Browning " is glad to know the brine salt on his lips and the large air again," and finds invigorating influences and infinite encouragement in the midst of toil and storm ; quædam divina voluptas, a certain divine gladness in the wind and reeling seas.

You will seek in vain in Tennyson for the larger elements, the far horizons of thought, the wide and gracious spaces, the unimagined depths, the austere yet tranquillising sadness, the severe unbroken calm, the magnanimities of the greatest poetry. You will seek in vain for the presence of the higher imagination. The popular verdict will not have it so. It will affirm that none of the qualities of the highest poetry are absent from Tennyson's verse. But for those acquainted, however slightly, with the literature of the world's past, passage after passage will rise to mind, passage after passage beside which there is nothing of Tennyson's to be placed. Take one from a contemporary :

" The centre-fire heaves underneath the earth,
And the earth changes like a human face ;
The molten ore bursts up among the rocks,
Winds into the stone's heart, outbranches bright
In hidden mines, spots barren river-beds,
Crumbles into fine sand where sunbeams bask—
God joys therein. The wroth sea's waves are edged
With foam, white as the bitter lip of hate,
When, in the solitary waste, strange groups
Of young volcanos come up, cyclops-like,
Staring together with their eyes on flame—
God tastes a pleasure in their uncouth pride.
Then all is still ; earth is a wintry clod :
But spring-wind, like a dancing psaltress, passes
Over its breast to waken it, rare verdure
Buds tenderly upon rough banks, between
The withered tree-roots and the cracks of frost,
Like a smile striving with a wrinkled face ;
The grass grows bright, the boughs are swollen with blooms
Like chrysalids impatient for the air,
The shining dorrs are busy, beetles run
Along the furrows, ants make their ado ;
Above, birds fly in merry flocks, the lark
Soars up and up, shivering for very joy ;
Afar the ocean sleeps ; white fishing gulls
Flit where the strand is purple with its tribe
Of nested limpets ; savage creatures seek
Their loves in wood and plain—and God renews
His ancient rapture."

I have elsewhere said that Browning was our only representative of Christian art in an era of classical revival. And he was so because his interest centred in the individual rather than in any terrestrial future of the race, and because in the pursuit of his art, his reach exceeded his grasp, his thought outsped his expression. He passed by, and that deliberately, the possibility of perfection in a limited sphere of endeavour, preferring to follow forever the supreme unapproachable ideal. In Browning's poetry the splendid elevations alternate with the levels of indisputable prose. It was not so with Tennyson. Where inspiration failed, the labour of the artist was redoubled and the verse showed no signs of weakness. Tennyson, to use his own phrase, "respected the limitations," wrought with no material save such as he could fashion to perfection, grasped and outlined his thought with the sharp precision of one who speaks of familiar experiences, and was master of all the keys of his instrument. Tennyson clove the mark at which he aimed, but Browning's arrow, like that of the archer of ancient story, sped, in an arc of light, beyond the ken of the gazers, to be lost in the overarching heaven.

When the critic has put on record his judgments, but one part of his duty is performed. He must put on record his admiration also. And if the office of the poet were to be a minister of sweet pleasure only, I do not know that Tennyson might not be rightly judged the first of the moderns. There is no body of the century's verse wherein for ear and heart a feast of purer, more unalloyed delight is spread. And Tennyson's reward was the reward of acceptance. By the choice of his subjects as well as by the variety of his form, by the simplicity and directness of his method and by the tempered perfection of his art he made his irresistible appeal to his countrymen. Even in his rendering of an old-world story, in his treatment of a Greek myth, he satisfied the modern ear, he created the atmosphere that was the poetic breath of life to the sensitive minds of the time. In his lyrics, where he was most original, he made an almost untouched field of human feeling his own, the field of that vague, wordless autumnal sadness of the spirit, a sadness that seems to have its source in a secret sympathy with some hidden sorrow lying deep in the heart of Nature, the universal mother. Tennyson was born for acceptance as a poet; under his transmuting touch all material became poetic. He was born for acceptance, and in his strong practical qualities, in his deep-rooted love for the heroic, as displayed in his stirring ballads of action, in his tender domesticities, as well as in his unquenchable patriotism and love of political order, he was a poet after the English heart. He may well spare to others the crowns of their deserving, the people's garland of affection will long be Tennyson's.

That from first to last in Tennyson's poetry the idea of law is paramount, that the central doctrine of his political and social creed was the doctrine of an equable progress under the reign of law—all this has been sufficiently dwelt on by the critics. His philosophy, too, has been sufficiently dwelt on, his ethical and religious teaching. One word more may be added. Of his creed, the creed of optimism, it is inevitable that the inquiry be made, Of what validity is such a creed, reached by a process unknown to logic, supported only by frail trembling desires and emotions that know not the place of their birth?

What is the poet that we should trust him, and who shall be our prophet but the man of science, the revealer of the indisputable fact? There is but one answer to these questions : We are not optimists by nature, neither are we pessimists. To the cry of despair in the poetry of the world, ofttimes an exceeding bitter cry, the heart of man responds no less than to its cry of hope—

“ Surgit amari aliquid, quod in ipsis floribus angat. ”

To the cry of despair in the poetry of the world, let it be fully granted, the heart, indeed, responds, but from the beginning of things one thought has never found a more than momentary place in human minds, one thought has seemed to all men intolerable—that the base and selfish and unjust and craven-hearted have read the riddle of life aright ; that the battle has been and will be to these, and that its pure and merciful and brave and generous souls are the foolish and the vanquished ones of earth. This, even in the foolishness that is our only wisdom, we cannot think. And at the foundations of all poetry and philosophy to which we are accustomed to look for the awakening and the nourishment of the best and highest in man, at the foundations of all poetry and philosophy we find that they are built upon this rock of faith. We shall do well to be on the side of Plato, and of the household of the poets.

Methuen's Standard Library

In Sixpenny Volumes.

THE STANDARD LIBRARY is a new series of volumes containing the great classics of the world, and particularly the finest works of English literature. All the great masters will be represented, either in complete works or in selections. It is the ambition of the publishers to place the best books of the Anglo-Saxon race within the reach of every reader, so that the series may represent something of the diversity and splendour of our English tongue. The characteristics of THE STANDARD LIBRARY are four:—1. SOUNDNESS OF TEXT. 2. CHEAPNESS. 3. CLEARNESS OF TYPE. 4. SIMPLICITY. The books are well printed on good paper at a price which on the whole is without parallel in the history of publishing. Each volume contains from 100 to 250 pages, and is issued in paper covers, Crown 8vo, at Sixpence net, or in cloth gilt at One Shilling net. In a few cases long books are issued as Double Volumes or as Treble Volumes.

The following books are ready with the exception of those marked with a †, which denotes that the book is nearly ready:—

The Westminster Commentaries

General Editor, WALTER LOCK, D.D., Warden of Keble College,
 Dean Ireland's Professor of Exegesis in the University of Oxford.

The object of each commentary is primarily exegetical, to interpret the author's meaning to the present generation. The editors will not deal, except very subordina- tely, with questions of textual criticism or philology; but, taking the English text in the Revised Version as their basis, they will try to combine a hearty acceptance of critical principles with loyalty to the Catholic Faith.
